Mr. Chairman, with all due respect for the gentleman offering it, and I have a lot of respect for the gentleman, I would like to say that I think the amendment is somewhat mischievous, and it really is sort of a backdoor attempt to gut the bill. I know perhaps the gentleman did not mean that, but that is the way I view the amendment.

So, Mr. Chairman, I hope we reject this amendment.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for her comments.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, let me just assure the gentlewoman from Ohio that there is no mischievous intention in presenting this amendment. We have thought it through very carefully, and it seems to me that it is intended to really accomplish a worthwhile objective.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to just say to the gentleman from Minnesota who made reference to the fact that the bill does empower the Federal Reserve, for example, to close the door to this kind of fraud and abuse once it is detected. I would suggest to the gentleman that that really amounts to after-the-fact protection, and I do not think that you can really try to retrieve the horse by shutting the barn door after the horse has escaped.

What we are dealing with here is the here-and-now situation when an institution must make a decision and can indeed verify that one of these three factual situations applies, and then is either given or not given under this amendment or the bill the discretion necessary to deal with that. I think it is a very straightforward, commercially recognized proposition that we are simply trying to preserve in the banking community.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his insight on what he is attempting to do, and I certainly understand the gentleman's intent and do not fault it. I disagree with the impact of the amendment.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment and congratulate the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY] for offering it. During deliberations of the Expedited Funds Availability Act, the committee considered an amendment offered by Mr. SHUMWAY which would have excluded a check from the availability schedules if an institution had a "good faith" doubt that the check was uncollectable. As pointed out, the author of the amendment has narrowed the scope of the language to include only cases of bankruptcy, fraud, or check kiting. Opponents of this amendment argue that the solution for such a case would be for the depository institution to either refuse to accept the check for deposit altogether or to accept the check on a collection basis only.

I do not believe this is an acceptable solution to the potential fraud problem facing depository institutions. To force institutions to refuse suspect checks, or accept them on a collection basis, is not in the best interest of consumers. As Mr. BARNARD points out institutions can refuse a check. As the author of the amendment points out, refusing suspect checks or accepting the check on a collection basis will ultimately result in substantially increased costs to consumers, as well as significantly greater delays, in many cases, to consumers receiving access to their funds.

Further, I understand that the funds availability laws in the States of New York, California, and Massachusetts contain much broader language regarding a necessary exemption for items where there is a good faith doubt that the item will be uncollectable. This exemption has not been abused in any of the States where it is currently in use.

A final point I would like to make in support of this amendment concerns the "prevention of fraud losses" provision already contained in the bill. Currently, H.R. 2443 contains language permitting the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve to suspend the availability schedules to any classification of checks if the Board determines that, first, depository institutions are experiencing an unacceptable level of losses due to check-related fraud; and third, if necessary to diminish the volume of such fraud. While this language offers depository institutions some protection, it is very different from the language proposed today by Mr. SHUMWAY.

Under section 4(g) of the bill, a pattern of abuse must exist in a broad classification of checks before the Federal Reserve may intervene. In fact, the Federal Reserve must show that the institutions have already experienced loss due to fraud. We all certainly know who will ultimately pay for those losses. The language contained in the bill does not allow an exemption on an item-by-item basis or for a particular check. The amendment offered by Mr. SHUMWAY provides a safety net for the industry which would allow quick action in the event the depository institution reasonably believes that circumstances surrounding the presented check involve bankruptcy, fraud, or kiting. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to support the gentleman's amendment.

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by my distinguished and respected colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY].

Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of H.R. 2443, the bill that will protect American consumers against unfair check hold practices of many of our banking institutions. This bill is key to alleviating the unnecessary burden placed upon bank customers, particularly those on low or fixed income, which is caused by banks placing unduly long holds on deposited checks, even on those drawn from the Government or an employer or another local bank. It is also a bill to reduce the unearned profits that these banks reap from the "float" game, a practice of investing funds deposited by customers while denying these same customers access to or interest on these funds.

The amendments being offered today will drastically cut the efficacy of this legislation. Let's call a spade a spade. These are not amendments aimed at controlling fraud, as the banking community is arguing, for check fraud is not a great problem. Less than 1 percent of all checks deposited are returned for nonpayment, and of those, 60 percent are paid in the second presentation. In addition, after much committee investigation and testimony on the subject, there is still no proof of a relationship between the length of a check hold period and the elimination of fraud.

These amendments are, in fact, vehicles for banks to skirt the law. The very nature of the language of the amendments offered will create loopholes. They would allow banking institutions to hold checks beyond the scheduled period—attempt to skirt the law—whenever there is reasonable belief that a customer may be declaring bankruptcy, reasonable belief that the check may be part of a fraud scheme, or reasonable belief that there is evidence of alteration or forgery. The rewording of the amendment to specify these three circumstances under which the banks may deny a customer access to funds does not correct the underlying weakness of the wording. Without a standard of evidence for reasonable belief, the banks can interpret banking account actions at will, place a hold on deposited funds, and continue to profit on the use of these funds at the customers expense.

We cannot let this happen. Bank depositors, all consumers, have a right to quick, reliable access to their own money and to earn interest on their own money. I urge you to support this important consumer legislation, H.R. 2443.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. KAPTUR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHUMWAY. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to respond to one of the points that the gentlewoman made in her debate.

It is true that, certainly, banks always have the discretion to refuse to accept for deposit a check which might look doubtful to them for some reason. But I would just suggest to the gentlewoman that that kind of action on the part of banks does not go to promote good relationships with the institution and its customer base. They are there to serve customers, and they would like to do what they should do to answer the needs of those customers.

It also does not talk about the problem that does exist when a check has already been deposited in a bank and then, after the fact, the institution discovers that the check is uncollectable, only at that point. Now, there is nothing to protect the institution against loss at that point if they cannot exercise this kind of discretion that my amendment gives them.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. KAPTUR. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman has just said is what this amendment does. Instead of saying, "Well, we are not going to accept a check for collection because we have reason to believe that you are in bankruptcy, in a legal dispute, or something like that," what this amendment does is to say to the bank, "You don't have to tell them, so you can take the check and maybe use it and maybe have the use of those funds, and if they want the funds, you just say, 'We have reason to believe that you are in a legal dispute.' "

I would like to have the bank to have the guts to tell the customer, "We don't want to accept your check."

Let us not ruin the legislation.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. KAPTUR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHUMWAY. I appreciate the gentlewoman's yielding.

I would just say to the chairman that, certainly, the fact that the banks do not want to put themselves in that situation of having to tell their depositor those things, they would be very reluctant to exercise the provisions of this amendment.

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, I just want to say to the gentleman that I think every business in this country is in business to do business, and one has to decide on a customer's worth and their ability to pay bills. Banks have to do that, just like supermarkets or drycleaners or retail stores. There are all sorts of credit checks. Banks certainly have more access to information than some smaller businesses in our country do, and I do not think that by making that type of determination they are doing anything out of the ordinary.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I think the last colloquy illustrates why many of us are against the amendment. We are not in this bill taking away the power of a bank to refuse a check when it has a question about its validity. We are requiring them to do that in an open way, notifying the consumer.

Now, the gentleman from California says, "Well, the bank would be reluctant to do that openly."

Yes, that is what we want to do; we want to substitute for a situation where we do not want the bank automatically to assume that all risk goes to the customer. We do not want the bank to have to make any kind of calculation in that case. Under the current system, as the gentleman I think has implicitly testified, it is the consumer's problem. If the bank has a problem with the check, they take the check, they are under no obligation to tell the consumer. That consumer might, after a week or 2 weeks, on a check drawn on the same city, make the natural assumption that in this great technological age the bank in 2 weeks has been able to get the money from the bank next door, write a check and have it bounce on him, because he has not been told.

Yes, the bank ought to have to, if it is going to reject its consumer's check, tell the consumer that. That puts the consumer on notice. The consumer, that way, might be able to go to that company and say, "Wait a minute, that's no good." In other words, the current system says the bank can protect itself against the bankrupt, but the consumer cannot. All the risk of that will go on the consumer.

In addition, I want to say we are describing the current situation. But this bill mandates the Federal Reserve to come up with a system in over 3 years for this to happen.

Today we have got exchanges being opened at 5 o'clock in the morning. You read in the paper, in the financial pages, about these poor people in suburban New Jersey and suburban New York City, they have got to get out of bed at 5 o'clock in the morning to make their $250,000 a year because the exchanges are open in London and because instant communications are such that, when it comes to trading back and forth, when it comes to arbitrage in currency, when it comes to all of those financial transactions, we have virtual worldwide instantaneous communication of large amounts of money. Differences of minutes can mean a lot of money; differences of hours can put you out of business.

It ought not to be impossible, for the people who have constructed that system, in 3 years and 3 months to come up with a system that says that a consumer ought to be able to get his or her money within a few days, not hours; and, simultaneously, the bank should be able to know if the check is collectable.

In other words, what we are saying to the Federal Reserve Board is, "You want to protect the bank, and so do we. Come up with a system which will allow that to happen within 4 days."

No one familiar with current technology argues that it is impossible today for the bank to get those determinations within 4 days.

It is possible for the banks, if they want to, to get that money.

The question is: Where are we going to put the incentive to improve? If we leave the risk totally on the consumer, as it is today, there is no incentive on the part of the banking community or on the Federal Reserve Board to improve that system.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to the chairman, who has done a superb job in bringing this bill forward.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, staff has just brought to my attention a statement that will be published in the RECORD by our colleague, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and he says:

> The bankruptcy laws include provisions that permit persons or companies who have filed bankruptcy to continue writing checks and that protect entities that deal with parties who have filed bankruptcy. In many instances, a court-appointed trustee must cosign these checks. Businesses that file under the chapter 11 reorganization provisions of the Bankruptcy Code need to be able to conduct business in the same manner as other companies, subject to bankruptcy court control and scrutiny, in order to survive.
> Then bankruptcy laws offer sufficient protection against bad checks, and the amendment would interfere with the aim of the bankruptcy laws.

Mr. FRANK. I thank the gentleman. Any time I can yield to one of my chairman for him to quote another of my chairman, I think I have certainly done the right thing.

Mr. Chairman, just to summarize, we have in this bill an amendment adopted in committee which says the Federal Reserve Board may suspend the whole bill, part of the bill, it may suspend it geographically, it may suspend it regionally, it may suspend it for different types of checks, if it finds a pattern of abuse. And we have a 45-day period in which to correct that, 45 legislative days. It gives to the banks, we hope, in 3 years and 3 months, a system by which they can protect themselves, and it says, as the gentleman from California has knowledged—his amendment does not say it does not grant the banks the power to protect themselves. They have that now. What the gentleman from California objects to is if the bank wants to protect itself in this case now, assuming that there is a particular check which would not be covered by the language read by the gentleman from Rhode Island, if the banks want to protect themselves, they do it without necessarily telling the consumer, they do it without there being any particular way for the consumer to protect himself.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FRANK was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. SHUMWAY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the bill now allows the Federal Reserve to exempt a classification of checks if indeed they see that fraud is occurring.

What happens on the single individual check that is presented on a one-by-one basis at the time the check is presented? There is no relief at all for the bank at that point.

Mr. FRANK. Yes; there is. The gentleman has admitted the bank can reject the check. But what the gentleman from California says is, "Well, the bank might not want to reject the check openly, that might anger the consumer." So what he wants the bank to be able to do is not say to the consumer, "We won't accept your check because we think there is a problem and we are not going to take it," we want the bank to say, "I am your friendly neighborhood banker, put your check in here, but if you decide to draw on that check, you may get whacked, and you are on your own."

So that is the difference. Yes, the bank has got that right to reject it. The consumer has the right to contest it. The consumer has the right to go to the person who sent the check and say, "Wait a minute, am I getting stuck?"

What the gentleman has said is the banks are reluctant to accept the responsibility to do it openly because they may anger the consumer.

Well, I think consumers are angrier at having that done to them silently than if it were done openly, and we would rather have the consumer have the information.

I yield again to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHUMWAY. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

On that point, there is not any effort here at all to allow banks to do something by disguising their motives. Indeed, the law that applies to this subject in my home State of California requires that notice be given to the depositor if there is going to be one of these sections invoked by the receiving bank.

I am not trying to undo that notice. It is something that banks have lived with. It is a system that has worked very well in California. And I am not suggesting that we should change the law in that regard.

Mr. FRANK. I will yield to the gentleman again if he would show me where in his amendment it mentions that notice.

Mr. SHUMWAY. My amendment does not speak to the notice, but I am saying it does apply in my home State——

Mr. FRANK. Reclaiming my time, it is reassuring for me to know that in the gentleman's home State of California that notice is given. I would say to the gentleman that while more and more of us are living in California, not all of us are living there yet. Under the gentleman's amendment, the notice that he so proudly proclaims is extended to people in his home State of California is not extended, so the notice is not included, and my point remains that the difference is whether it is done openly or not.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to the gentleman from New York, who has been a sponsor of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] has again expired.

(On request of Mr. SCHUMER and by unanimous consent, Mr. FRANK was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman and I and the gentleman from New York, the chairman, were involved in that 45-day suspension period. We do not have wording in the legislation that says whether that 45-day suspension period can be renewed consecutively.

Is it not true that it was the understanding of all of us, when we passed that legislation, at least the gentleman from Massachusetts, the gentleman from New York, and others who were in the discussion, that that could not be renewed until the year was up?

Mr. FRANK. That was our understanding, unless there were some very extraordinary circumstances.

Mr. SCHUMER. Correct.

Mr. FRANK. I mean if Congress were in the middle of acting on something to correct it and we were unable to act, in that very extraordinary circumstance. But the general intention, that 45-day suspension of legislative days was to allow the Congress to act, to bring it to our attention. We can no longer use the legislative veto form, or we would have used that, constitutionally. So the intention is to bring it to our attention, and if we disagree with them, they are not supposed to reinvoke that.

I yield to the chairman, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN].

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I want to rise and state that indeed, as one who participated in the drafting and the adoption of that section, that I care. I would like to make another statement. I want to commend the gentleman from Massachusetts for his analysis of the pending amendment. As usual, his incisive mind has come up with additional defects in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FRANK was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, I continue to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I would also like to make a point to those of our colleagues who are busy in their offices and are unable to be on the floor but who are, nonetheless, following the debate. This amendment is a banker's amendment. This amendment is not supported by the consumers and the people who elected you and I to this office.

So I would say that we should reject this amendment because it is antipeople, anticonsumer, and probank. The banks are protected in this bill very, very sufficiently. Now, let us not be hoodwinked into adopting this amendment; it would destroy the effectiveness of the entire bill.

Again, I wish to commend the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, there is an old story that comes out of the Southwest United States somewhere where apparently a local county judge was a cashier in a bank, and a man presented a check for payment. He was a stranger in town, and the judge, who was the cashier, looked to him and said, "The identification you have is just not adequate." The guy said, "Well, judge, I hear you hang people for less evidence than this." The judge said, "Well, that is probably right; but when you are talking about cash, you have got to be very careful."

That is what this bill is all about, my colleagues. We are talking about cash transactions in the form of a check.

Mr. Chairman, the testimony the Banking Committee heard clearly showed that some financial institutions' funds availability policies are excessive, and do impose unjustified delays on consumers in withdrawing moneys which they have deposited. When a customer deposits a check, the bank receives the equivalent of cash from the check-collection process in 1 or 2 days. As one Member of this body, I believe there is no justification for a blanket hold policy that denies customers the use of deposited funds, including Government checks, for as long as 2 weeks. Financial institutions should provide established, financially responsible customers with funds availability in accordance with when the institution can use the funds.

I see no reason why all Government checks payable to, and endorsed by, a customer with an established relationship with the bank of deposit should not be given next-day availability. Also, depositors should receive interest on their funds no later than receipt of provisional credit by the depository institution.

As we all know this bill requires depository institutions to provide specific disclosure of their funds availability policies to new and existing customers. I believe a great part of the check-hold problem is that many customers simply are unaware of what their institution's hold policies are. Full disclosure may well be the most effective remedy for the abuses brought to light in our hearings. Consumers, armed with correct information, would then be able to shop for the institution which best serves their check clearing needs.

Mr. Chairman, we are all here today on behalf of consumers' interests. But the promises we make today in this bill should not result in higher costs and added inconvenience for consumers 3 years from now.

Few would argue that no legitimate justification exists for placing holds on funds in some instances. Several days may pass before a financial institution discovers that a deposited check has bounced or is otherwise dishonored by the bank on which it is drawn. Financial institutions must have an opportunity to guard against bad checks, fraud, and check-kiting schemes.

Our national check processing system is extremely complex. The check-collection system is still predominantly a system of paper transfers; we are several years and a huge investment away from converting to electronic forms.

The system moves approximately 40 billion checks each year written on more than 40,000 institutions, each operating with different geographic, competitive, and technological constraints. It is not simply a case of neighboring banks. The problem also applies to a check written on a California bank and deposited in a Virginia institution.

While we are all aware of clear abuses in check-hold policies, the problem may be overstated when you examine the percentage of checks on which holds are actually placed. Many institutions provide their customers with excellent availability. A survey conducted by the California Banking Commissioner's office in 1984 revealed that less than one-tenth of 1 percent of all deposits in that State were subjected to a hold. Another survey done by the Houston Clearing House Association in the Greater Houston area also showed that less than one-tenth of 1 percent of deposited items were subjected to a hold.

Sovran Bank, Virginia's largest with 265 branches, provides its depositors with immediate availability for all U.S. Treasury drafts, cashier's checks, and checks drawn on Sovran accounts. Moreover, Sovran provides immediate availability for all other checks deposited on all of its depositors' accounts, except new accounts opened within the last 60 days. Sovran's superb availability policies are not without cost to the bank because it is paying interest on funds for which it does not receive provisional credit for usually 2 days.

This bill requires that after 3 years from the date it is passed, that funds be made available for local checks at the start of the business day following the day the check is deposited. What's more, it mandates 3-day availability on nonlocal checks within 3 years of passage. This schedule is at a minimum overly optimistic and at worst unworkable for banks and their customers.

As I have said before, this bill is classic legislative overkill. We have equipped ourselves with an elephant gun to do away with limited abuses when a few well-aimed swipes with a flyswatter by the Federal Reserve or the States would solve the problem.

The Federal Reserve Board told the committee that the check-hold problem is an "essentially localized problem." The National Conference of State Legislatures spokesman reported that the individual States are "leading the way" in dealing with the problem, with six States with laws already on their books and over a dozen more considering remedies for related consumer concerns.

Of course, the bill's availability schedule has a certain superficial appeal, but a closer examination reveals landmines which threaten to wipe out most of the benefits this bill promises consumers. Let me mention just a few of those problems.

This bill will require a huge investment by banks and the Federal Reserve to meet its availability schedule. Federal Reserve Board Vice Chairman Preston Martin reported that in order to comply with the mandate of 3-day availability on nonlocal checks within 5 years of the bill's passage, the bill's initial timeframe, a multi-billion-dollar investment in electronic processing equipment, software, mainframe computers, and linkages through extensive branch systems would be required. H.R. 2443, as reported today, narrows the onset of 3-day availability for nonlocal checks to 3 years from the date of passage, and thus spreads this cost over an even shorter time period.

Experts in financial data processing have said that the only way to comply with this schedule is for wholesale conversion to electronic banking, which would require consumers to suddenly abandon paper checks and turn to debit cards and automatic teller machines. Recent surveys show that consumers have not widely accepted these new methods. Who should make this decision about how the citizens of our Nation do their banking, Congress or consumers in a free marketplace?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PARRIS] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. PARRIS was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

The cost of complying with the bill's mandates could be especially heavy for smaller institutions that lack the array of electronic check-clearing equipment possessed by big-city banks. Is it realistic to impose the same requirements on a small bank in rural Nebraska as are imposed on a big New York City money center bank? That is what this bill does.

In addition, the Congressional Budget Office indicates that this bill will cost the Federal Reserve System up to $30 million annually to comply with its requirements. But of what importance is $30 million when the Fed will simply recoup this cost by increasing the fees it charges to depository institutions?

The bill also requires that after 3 years, funds must be made available for local checks at the start of the business day following the day the check is deposited or next-day availability. This schedule is at a minimum overly optimistic and at worst unworkable for banks, because it is fraught with the potential for check fraud.

Today, the vast majority of local checks are not received by the payor institution until well after the start of business. It is highly unlikely that even an enhanced check-collection system could provide for delivery of all checks to the payor institution within this rigid timeframe, let alone notice of return, according to the Federal Reserve. As a result, depository banks making funds available in accordance with the bill's schedule run the risk of incurring a loss on a dishonored check because insufficient time exists for the check to be sent to the originating bank and returned unpaid. Banks may be faced with increased losses, which will add to their cost of doing business.

In our haste to expedite funds availability, we have ignored the troubling question of who will eventually pay for the bill's added investment and costs. Those of us who champion the consumers' true interests know that Congress has no money available to pay for the multi-billion-dollar investment we are imposing. As is almost always the case in the business world, banks will inevitably pass on all of this extra cost of doing business to their customers in higher service fees. We are sticking consumers with the final bill for the expensive investment required by H.R. 2443.

If we ignore all of the problems I have mentioned, this body should at the very least support the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from California, Mr. SHUMWAY. There is a legitimate and compelling need to provide very narrowly drawn exceptions to the availability schedules where a bank has reasonable cause to believe a check may not be collectible because the depositor may be insolvent or involved in fraud or kiting schemes.

I urge my colleagues to support the Shumway amendment which will significantly improve this proposal and will remedy the pitfalls the original bill has for consumers.

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARRIS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McCOLLUM. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard an argument earlier this afternoon and I think the gentleman's remarks are right on the point and I agree with them. I think the argument needs to be addressed a little bit.

The idea that some people have been saying that the bank may reject a check as a practical matter as a solution to this whole problem is just absurd. It would render chaos to the entire community of the business world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PARRIS] has expired.

(On request of Mr. McCOLLUM and by unanimous-consent Mr. PARRIS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I continue to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McCOLLUM. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, it would render chaos in the business world if banks felt compelled, because of suspicion and concern over the institutional well-being of various organizations and businesses in a community, to reject their checks. To reject checks written on accounts with their banks. Just because they have heard rumors, and there are rumors about financial instability or what-have-you.

The logical process which is followed now is to let those checks be deposited, go through the check-clearing process under a hold system, and then ultimately be either rejected or collected at the other end. Then pay out the money to the person who has made the deposit. I think that is why the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY] is so reasonable. It would allow for the banks to continue this practice in those cases where they would otherwise probably want to reject, but which would disrupt the financial system. For businesses it might not be actually going to go belly-up or be fraudulent. They may have the funds in the bank down the road.

It just may be that they have a bad reputation at that moment that is unfounded.

So I think the gentleman's points were well made about the whole financial institution system and the fact that we need so strongly to correct the legislation so we do not render havoc with it, in addition to what he had to say about the need to be concerned about the rejection concept.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding and letting me comment on it. I, too, strongly support the Shumway amendment.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his contribution, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I think once again the major arguments have been flushed out very well on both sides.

Summing up on this side, let me first elaborate on something the committee chairman had mentioned. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee has stated to this body in a statement that this amendment is flawed and it would do havoc with the bankruptcy laws. Let me just read an excerpt. This is from what Chairman RODINO had to say:

> The amendment is flawed because it treats a person or company that may file bankruptcy the same as a person or company that has filed bankruptcy and by permitting the banks complete discretion to decide themselves who may file bankruptcy. How can it be accurately determined who is about to file for bankruptcy? The banks should not be given to power to make such a decision. Since no standard is set for banks, they can seemingly hold up a payment on a check and use it as a bargaining tool in a bankruptcy proceeding.

That alone, I say to the Member of the House, is enough to reject the Shumway amendment.

Let me sum up three arguments that really reside against the Shumway amendment. One is vagueness. There is no standard in the Shumway amendment.

Would Eastern Air Lines be subject to it because there are rumors in the newspapers that it is possibly going bankrupt? Would that allow banks to hold every check from Eastern Air Lines employees? One does not know. The current hold policies, we are told, are based on the need to protect themselves against fraud, but the long and short of it is, I say to the Members of the House, that the loopholes in the Shumway amendment are enough to drive 40 billion checks through.

The second problem that is stated is that there is no notice to consumers. If indeed a bank is going to hold up a check, why cannot they let the consumer know? It is plain and simple. That is not in the Shumway amendment, as has been elaborated before.

Third, they are going to have the bank be judge and jury, as well as one side in the case. It is going to be in a bank's interest to lean against the consumer.

This bill has adequate impartial arbiters: the Federal Reserve Board, as well as the commission. That has not been mentioned so far, but it is in the bill's language.

Why let banks decide, when it is certainly in their interest to lean against the consumer and, on a whim or a chance, decide that a check is not creditworthy?

For those three reasons, as well as the problems it produces in any kind of a standard bankruptcy proceeding, I think that we should let the Shumway amendment be defeated and move the bill. As I stated in the beginning of this debate, this should be a year for consumers. Deregulation has made it necessary that this committee and this body move to protect consumers in banking.

The Shumway amendment would strip this first piece of legislation of most of its proconsumer impact. Let us move this bill, and let us in this committee move along with the proconsumer legislation that deregulation has necessitated.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Shumway amendment, and I wish to engage in a colloquy with my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from California. A number of points have been raised during the course of this debate which I think bear reiteration.

The distinguished ranking Republican member of the committee raised the point that good-faith exemptions now exist in a number of States and there in fact have been no signs of abuse. That is the only track record we have to go on, and I would like to ask the author of the amendment if that is in fact the case.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, that is the case, and I have referred to the California experience, not to hold up California as the beacon for the Nation but simply because that is a place where we have had an actual track record of operating under this kind of language.

Mr. DREIER of California. And in fact it is the most strict language of any of that which exists in any of the other States, which include, I believe, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, and Connecticut; is that correct?

Mr. SHUMWAY. As I understand it, there are five States that have adopted such laws, and four of them allow for the good-faith exemption we talked about in committee. California has a law very closely paralleling that which I have offered here but which is a tighter standard.

Mr. DREIER of California. I would also like to ask the gentleman this: If a bank were in the process of accepting a deposit and had found, after having accepted that deposit, that the institution was in the process of being victim to a check-kiting scheme, what would happen under the present writing of this bill?

Mr. SHUMWAY. Under this legislation the bank would have no recourse once it has accepted that check for deposit. Providing it does not come within the other minimal exemptions, the $5,000 and the new-deposit exemptions, the bank would simply be stuck.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. chairman, I have one other question which relates slightly to this amendment.

Correctly and commendably, the chairman refers to the fact that we must have Government checks deposited and paid on as soon as possible. In the 5 years that I have been here, I have been consistently faced with this question as to whether or not we are going to increase the national debt ceiling, and just last year on several occasions we saw the news reports that because of a lack of action here in the Congress the Federal Government was going to come to a standstill.

What I would like to know is, under this legislation would a bank still be required to pay a Government check even if the Treasury was not going to honor it?

Mr. SHUMWAY. The answer is clearly, yes. Now, of course a bank would have some degree of discretion on checks of that sort and others. But under this legislation there would be a straitjacket effect that would mandate the alternative action of the bank.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREIER of California. Yes, I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, the banks know and every citizen of the United States of America knows when we face that type of a crisis because every channel on television and every radio station plays it up. It is a drama that they enjoy, that Government workers may not be paid and social security recipients may not be paid. So certainly the banks are on notice as well that they may not be paid.

So I am certain that if we were not to agree to increase the deficit, the banks would be on notice, and they would just say to you and to me when we go down with our little checks, "Sorry, we can't accept that because you have not agreed to increase the deficit."

Mr. DREIER of California. But, Mr. Chairman, is there a provision in this bill which protects the institution from being required to pay it?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. There is nothing in this bill that says you are required to accept the check. All it says is that if you accept the check, you must in a timely fashion give credit to the depositor.

Mr. DREIER of California. Not to disparage a teller at all, but what if the teller happened to miss the evening news the night before and were to go ahead and receive that check and deposit it?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Well, that teller's career would be shortened immeasurably, I would imagine.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman very much. It's apparent that under this bill the news media will benefit as all bank tellers will be required to closely monitor the roller coaster actions of this Congress.

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I said earlier in the general debate on the bill that I realize this bill is not perfect. In committee a number of amendments were offered. I offered several myself.

One of the amendments I offered that was rejected was one that said, let us not have a patchwork quilt of State laws dealing with this particular subject; let us instead have a uniform Federal law.

During some of the discussion that has gone on relative to this particular amendment, there has been at least some mention of the State law which has been passed or enacted in the State of California.

What I would like to do is to yield for the purpose of having the author of this amendment respond to this question so he can tell us how the other five States treat this specific issue. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I appreciate the gentleman's raising the question. It is a very good point and one that needs to be understood by Members.

As I understand it, there are now five States that have similar laws to this one governing the subject of availability of deposited funds. In four of those States, those being Rhode Island, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New York, there is a good-faith exception which can be utilized by banks to put a hold upon checks presented for deposit.

The fifth State, California, as I have mentioned in an earlier colloquy, has a law which very closely parallels my amendment which I have offered here. It outlines three specific areas and requires on the part of the bank a reasonable belief in those areas, rather than just an unfettered grant of discretion, before one of the exceptions could be invoked.

So there is a patchwork quilt being developed, because not all States have the same kind of law.

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his response.

Reclaiming my time for another followup question, in the four States where the good faith provision is included, has it indeed been abused by the financial institutions that have been given prerogative?

Mr. SHUMWAY. There was no evidence of abuse at all presented to the committee during the hearings. We had representatives from a number of States that have had some operating experience and in every case there was no evidence or any hint even that the banks have indeed abused those procedures.

Mr. CARPER. In the discussion that occurred between the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Massachusetts earlier this afternoon, the issue of notice being part of the California bill, as opposed to this particular bill, was raised. Has the author of this amendment considered including in his amendment the notice provision?

Mr. SHUMWAY. I do not really have any bias against giving notice. In fact, I intend to introduce later in the afternoon a bill, or a substitute, which would rest the entire proposal on giving notice and making full disclosure to consumers. I have no objection to that. Simply in an effort to be simple and to be very straightforward in my amendment, I have not tried to load it up with provisions requiring notice.

Mr. CARPER. I thank the gentleman for his response.

For purposes of answering this question, let me yield to the chairman of the full committee. The question I want to ask of the chairman is absent this amendment, specifically what protections do these institutions have against, one, fraud; two, bankruptcy; and three, check kiting, because I believe we are all concerned about that.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, we are all concerned.

I would like to make a few points. No. 1, as to the patchwork quilt, what the other States do, I might mention, you see, I was a member of the State legislature in Rhode Island before I came to Washington. I felt that this was a step up in the world, and that because most of us here are fulltime and in Rhode Island they are in session 60 days a year. With all due deference to the State legislature, they do not have the time, the staff, et cetera, to analyze these things as we do; so I would like to feel that we in the Congress do not have to take a back seat to any State legislature.

No. 2, let us get to the gentleman's question. I think that Chairman RODINO has put the bankruptcy situation to rest in that which has already been introduced in the RECORD.

As to fraud and kiting, page 17 of the bill on prevention of fraud losses, as explained on page 20 of the report, prevention of check fraud losses, adequately takes care of the financial institutions.

Recall this, that at any point in time if this amendment is not in the bill, and as I said to the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER], there is nothing that says to a bank that it must accept a check. If they really feel that they are going to be defrauded, they can just say, "We are not going to take the check." That is all. That is why I oppose this amendment.

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his response.

Mr. SPRATT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of this committee, but I have been watching the debate and attending to the debate. I have some comments I would like to make.

I think the Shumway amendment is well-intended, well-supported and ought to be added to this bill.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNARD] started out by saying that the bank has an alternative. The bank simply can refuse to accept payment of a check. They can refuse to put the check in the process of collection. We ought to expose the fallacy in that.

Tellers do not have the knowledge, the information with which to intelligently make that particular decision. That decision is going to have to be made, if it deals with check kiting——

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. SPRATT. Certainly.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. By the same token, in one instance the gentleman says that the teller does not have the ability to make that decision. The gentleman just said that, right?

Mr. SPRATT. Yes.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. And yet what does the Shumway amendment do and what does it say? It says that if the teller feels there is reason to believe that there might be fraud or bankruptcy or legal procedures, they can put a hold on that check. So how in one instance does that teller bring it and in the other instance is not knowledgeable, if the gentleman will be good enough to explain that?

Mr. SPRATT. Very simple. I am making a generalization. The tellers are not likely to have the specific information needed to know whether there is check kiting going on, whether there is fraud afoot or whether their particular depositor is about to go bankrupt. The loan officer is likely to know that. The credit department may know it. The bookkeeping department may get wind of some sort of check kiting, but the teller on the teller line is not likely to know it. Now, if he or she does know it, then by golly, he or she can exercise that judgment. That is the first problem with this particular bill. It denies the override of intelligent decisionmaking in a bank by the people who have the ability and the knowledge to make that particular decision. It takes it away from them and it says that the teller or somebody at a very low level has got to make the decision when they do not have the information with which to make the decision intelligently. That is the first problem.

We say that this bill is to protect consumers against abuse. Well, let us protect consumers against abuse by other consumers who are going to cost them a lot of money, even if it is capped at $5,000, by putting into the process of collection and receiving credit on checks that are not any good because of bankruptcy or check-kiting schemes.

Second, it is said that this particular amendment is defective because it uses the standard of good faith or reasonableness. Well, anybody who has read the UCC knows that article II and article III are replete with the words "good faith."

Have you ever heard of the BFT, a bonafide purchaser, a good faith taker of a negotiable instrument? The UCC knows good faith and the courts adopt and interpret and enforce the UCC and they know how to deal with the concept of good faith.

Furthermore, the Shumway amendment has some very discrete grounds. Courts know how to identify whether or not a party has reasonable grounds for believing that a fraud is afoot or that a bankruptcy is imminent or that check kiting is going on.

There are three well-defined discrete grounds that a bank may show.

Now, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] said that this is going to be a self-fulfilling prophecy. If a bank can say, "I am not going to clear that check. I won't give you credit for it because I think you are about to go into bankruptcy," then every other creditor who gets wind of that will do likewise.

Well, there is a remedy in the law for that in common law. It is called slander or tort, slandering somebody's credit. Banks of all creatures know that they are deep pocket defendants and they are not going to publicize the fact that they suspect somebody is about to go into bankruptcy if they can possibly help it; so there is a remedy there.

In any event, if banks want to protect themselves if this amendment is not adopted, banks will have one remedy, one available remedy to protect themselves. They will refuse all checks where the depositor is presenting checks drawn on another bank or he is suspected of going into bankruptcy.

Now, how is that going to help people who are on the verge of bankruptcy or insolvency? It is going to close down the collection and banking system to them.

Finally, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] says that even the opponents of this bill do not want this particular amendment. Indeed, they do not. It strengthens the bill. It makes it a better bill. It makes it harder to attack. It ought to be adopted and added to this particular bill.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPRATT. Certainly.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the gentleman on his statement. I think it is an excellent summary of many of the problems with this bill.

Let me just address, if the gentleman will yield for just a moment or so, let me address a question to the chairman.

The chairman suggests that the banking system simply refuses to take a check. Let me give a real world scenario. You and your wife are in your car. You are vacationing. You are a thousand miles from here and for some strange reason you run out of cash. You go to a local bank. Do you really believe they are going to take your check now a thousand miles from here? Maybe they will from a Member of this body, but if you are just consumer No. 1, will they in fact? I submit that no, they will not.

Now, what do you do? Is that in the interest of the consumer? I suggest not.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California. The Judiciary Committee has the responsibility for ensuring the integrity and uniformity of the bankruptcy laws of this country. The amendment offered has not been considered by the Judiciary Committee, and would have a negative impact on the bankruptcy laws.

The amendment excepts from the bill's timetables checks written by or to someone who either has filed bankruptcy, or who the receiving depository institution reasonably believes may file bankruptcy. Presumably, the depository institution can set whatever timetable it likes for making funds available.

The bankruptcy laws include provisions that permit persons or companies who have filed bankruptcy to continue writing checks and that protect entities that deal with parties who have filed bankruptcy. In many instances, a court-appointed trustee must cosign these checks. Businesses that file under the chapter 11 reorganization provisions of the bankruptcy code need to be able to conduct business in the same manner as other companies, subject to bankruptcy court control and scrutiny, in order to survive.

The bankruptcy laws offer sufficient protection against bad checks, and the amendment would interfere with the aim of the bankruptcy laws.

The premise behind the gentleman's amendment insofar as bankrupt debtors are concerned seems to be that the risks that a bad check will be written are greater with a drawer or drawee that has filed bankruptcy. There has been no referral of this issue to the Judiciary Committee, however. At first glance, though, this premise seems inaccurate. Bankrupt debtors are always under bankruptcy court supervision and control; if the debtors write a bad check, the odds are that the court will impose stricter controls over the debtor's finances. This should be incentive for debtors not to write bad checks in the first place.

The amendment is flawed because it treats a person or company that may file bankruptcy the same as a person or company that has filed bankruptcy—and by permitting the banks complete discretion to decide for themselves who may file bankruptcy. How can it accurately be determined who is about to file for bankruptcy? The banks should not be given the power to make such a decision.

Since no standards are set for banks, they could seemingly hold up payment of a check, and use this as a bargaining tool in a bankruptcy proceeding. This would be totally repugnant to the ideas of bankruptcy court control of a proceeding and fair treatment of all creditors.

The amendment makes the bankruptcy or possible bankruptcy of the drawee of a check reason to except the check from the timetables of the bill. This makes no sense. The drawee is the person the check is made out to; its financial condition has nothing whatsoever to do with whether the check is good.

Since the amendment will negatively effect the bankruptcy laws, and since the Judiciary Committee has not had any opportunity to study the amendment despite its clear jurisdiction over the bankruptcy laws, the amendment should be defeated.

Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, a good many States have adopted expedited funds availability legislation. To my knowledge, everyone that has done so, certainly at least California and New York, which I believe was the first State, I believe Massachusetts also and Connecticut, have adopted legislation that mandates that the State regulatory body prescribe the time periods for check clearances, prescribe the time periods beyond which it would be impermissible for banks to engage in a nefarious float game. They have given the regulatory agencies the authority to be flexible in the implementation of those regulations.

In each State, according to the knowledge I have, there has been a good-faith exception permitted to the financial institutions.

Now, that is broadly interpreted—as good faith.

In each instance, that State legislation and that State regulation, including the good-faith exception or flexibility, has been heralded by consumer groups as about as strong consumer legislation as one could hope for.

Now, let us keep that in perspective. What do we have here? We have here a bill that is modeled after those State statutes, but decidedly different.

I strongly support the legislation before us. It is not the preferred legislation that I drafted, which I think would have been better, but I still strongly support it; however, I think it is important to realize that we do not create the mandate for the Federal regulatory agencies to prescribe time periods. We prescribe those time periods by legislation. They are very inflexible. They are very rigid. They cannot really be lifted except for fraud pursuant to an amendment that I offered, a very watered down amendment, I might add, in order to gain acceptance by the committee.

One difficulty with the committee bill, since there is a prescribed legislative period, is that we do not strike the appropriate balance, in my judgment, between preventing bank abuse of the check clearing process, to the detriment of the consumer, which is our primary aim, and avoiding the possibility that our demands for rapid action might place banks in a position of greatly increased liability.

I think that the bill can be improved tremendously by acceptance, therefore, of the Shumway amendment.

That is not to say that I agree with every word of the Shumway amendment, either.

As a matter of fact, I only saw it today, and unfortunately due to the modified rule, which neither the majority nor the minority on the Banking Committee wanted, we cannot offer amendments; but there are at least two things, I say to the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY], that disturb me about the gentleman's amendment.

One is the language when the gentleman refers to "or similar proceeding." I do think that the chairman of the committee has made a valid objection to the fact that "or similar proceeding" could be too broad.

Mr. Chairman, I am wondering if the gentleman would entertain my present unanimous consent to delete those three words, "or similar proceeding" from the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. Chairman, I hereby ask such unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE]?

Mr. SHUMWAY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from New York and I discussed this matter earlier. Frankly, I do not think those three words add anything in particular to my amendment. I would be very willing to go along with the gentleman's unanimous consent request that they be stricken.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE]?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I cannot agree to the unanimous consent request. I cannot go along with it, because we made the debate, made the argument on this to date, based on the amendment as offered as printed in the RECORD.

Although some of us disagreed, we did not seek that type of rule; nonetheless, the rule requires the amendments to be printed in the RECORD and, to the best of my knowledge, they are not amendable; and therefore, I do object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE] is recognized.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the fact the amendment is not permissible under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. LAFALCE was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. LAFALCE. That is why, Mr. Chairman, I asked for unanimous consent. We could have dealt with that nefarious modified rule that neither the chairman nor the majority or minority in the committee wanted.

I also am troubled by one other aspect of the Shumway amendment that has been discussed on this floor—and I did not discuss it personally with the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY]—and that is the lack of a call for notice, if the amendment is agreed to.

It is my intent, Mr. Chairman, and I hereby ask unanimous consent, to add at the conclusion of the gentleman's amendment the following words:

In such situations, the depository institution shall promptly notify the drawer and drawee of the check when it takes action pursuant to this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE]?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object so that I may make the statement to the effect that obviously there was intent not to add disclosure contained in this amendment. Even though it would be inserted here, when we go over to the Senate I feel there would be a move to delete it there.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to object because, very frankly, I disagree wholeheartedly with the Shumway amendment with or without the two unanimous-consent requests that have been made by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE] yield for the purpose of his parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. LAFALCE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] may proceed.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, is it not possible that a Member can offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY] along the lines that the gentleman from New York has suggested?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the Chair's understanding that an amendment can be offered to an existing amendment, as long as that amendment is germane.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, I yielded to the gentleman for the purpose of a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The gentleman yielded for the purpose of a parliamentary inquiry. It is still the time of the gentleman from New York, but that time has expired.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, having received an answer to that parliamentary inquiry, I wonder if it would be appropriate——

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair might intervene, the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. LAFALCE was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, if it is appropriate, I would ask that the changes that I asked be made by unanimous consent be combined and be considered now as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY].

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules of the House, the gentleman will have to send the amendment to the desk in writing so that the Clerk may report the suggested amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, before the Clerk reads the amendment, I would ask unanimous consent that the two amendments that I initially offered by unanimous consent be combined into one, and I renew my unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman's language at the desk?

Mr. LAFALCE. Yes, it is, Mr. Chairman.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. LA FALCE TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SHUMWAY

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAFALCE to the amendment offered by Mr. SHUMWAY: Strike the words "or similar proceeding" and add the words "in such situations, the depository institution shall promptly notify the drawer and drawee of the check when it takes action pursuant to this provision."

The CHAIRMAN. At this point, would the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE] restate his request?

Mr. LAFALCE. Yes. I have an amendment on the floor right now to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY], but it is my understanding that the gentleman from Rhode Island——

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I am asking that the gentleman renew his unanimous-consent requests. Why do you not do it one at a time?

Mr. LAFALCE. All right, I will do it one at a time.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my first amendment to the Shumway amendment, that which deletes the words "or similar proceedings," be consented to unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE]?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair might at this point advise the membership of the status of the proceedings.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE] has now offered and has had read an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY].

Does the gentleman from New York seek any action on that amendment at this time?

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, I would ask that we defer action on that amendment because of my understanding that the chairman of the full committee wishes to renew a request for a unanimous-consent seriatim.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is pending before the committee offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE], and at this point the gentleman would have to dispose of that amendment in some fashion before we could proceed to another amendment.

Mr. LAFALCE. Then I would ask, Mr. Chairman, that we have an immediate nod "yes" on that combined amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY]?

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I will not take the full time. I suspect, that I'm not the only person in this Chamber who is modestly confused. It is my understanding that we now have the amendment that was previously objected to by the chairman, which was changed by a second amendment which was objected to by the chairman, and now the two are combined in some kind of unholy alliance so that we have the amalgamation of both amendments before us, and the unanimous consent of the gentleman from New York applies so that we may consider that amendment.

Mr. Chairman, is that where we may be close to being?

Mr. LAFALCE. If the gentleman will yield, no, they are joined in a holy alliance rather than an unholy alliance.

Mr. PARRIS. It is a holy alliance? Is that his answer?

Mr. LAFALCE. If the gentleman will yield further, it is a holy alliance, one that I think the gentleman from Virginia would consent to readily, or should.

Mr. PARRIS. I appreciate the gentleman's comment and I support his amendment but the chairman has previously objected to both parts of it.

My point, Mr. Chairman, as I see the situation from a parliamentary standpoint, is that the chairman's position is that he objects to the amendment that many of us favored and he objected because the rule provides that no amendments shall be offered.

But the chairman indicated to us earlier today in the debate that he asked for an open rule, so if we had an open rule, this amendment would in fact be germane and we could discuss it and the House could work its will.

Mr. LAFALCE. If the gentleman will yield, I would advise the gentleman from Virginia that the reason I initially asked unanimous consent was because of my belief that no amendment could be offered to the Shumway amendment.

Upon the response to the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE], though, we were advised that an amendment was in order to the Shumway amendment. Since unanimous consent had initially not been obtained to my two unanimous-consent requests, I joined those two unanimous-consent requests in one combined amendment.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, the rule does not prohibit an amendment to an amendment that was printed in the RECORD. That is where we are.

Mr. LAFALCE. That was the ruling of the Chair in response to the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE].

Mr. PARRIS. I wonder if I could inquire of the chairman, the gentleman from Rhode Island, if he has any inclinations in regard to his position of support or objection to these combined amendments?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. If the gentleman will yield, I will seek my own time when the gentleman from Virginia has completed.

Mr. PARRIS. All right. My only problem with the process, Mr. Chairman, if you will, is that it seems to me that we have come full circle to a closed rule in spite of all of our earnest and, I think, good-faith representations that we want an open rule. Yet, as a net product of the parliamentary complications here, we are, in fact, hiding behind a closed rule in order not to address these amendments unless, in fact, they are accepted under unanimous consent, which I hope they will be.

Mr. LAFALCE. If the gentleman will yield, I guess I agree with him on his last hope that my amendment will be agreed to. I cannot agree with the gentleman, though, that the fact that there has been a ruling that I can offer an amendment to an amendment makes the rule more closed than it otherwise would be. It would seem to me that a rational person can only conclude that it was not as closed as it was originally thought and more open, therefore, than originally thought. So I would have to disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, reclaiming my time, would it not just be nice if we came out here on this floor just once and debated the merits of these amendments so that we had an honest consideration without all the fun and games.

Mr. LAFALCE. I could not agree with the gentleman more, but we must operate under the rules that have been agreed to.

Mr. PARRIS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman from New York, the amendment would strike the words "or similar proceedings" from the Shumway amendment.

Mr. LAFALCE. Yes.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. And he would add the words at the end of the full amendment:

> In such situations, the depository institution shall promptly notify the drawer and drawee of the check when it takes action pursuant to this provision.

Mr. LAFALCE. That is right.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. May I inquire of the gentleman. From whence comes this language? It is not an excerpt from the California regulation? In California, it is a regulation, is it not?

Mr. LAFALCE. My staff.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. In California, it is a regulation, is it not? I would yield to the gentleman from California for a response.

Mr. LAFALCE. There are disclosure requirements in the several States. I cannot tell the gentleman if this language is an exact replication of either California or New York regulations. It is the language that my staff came up with that they deemed best.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Could the gentleman tell me, when would disclosure have to be given?

Mr. LAFALCE. I put in the word "promptly." I did not define it as within 30 minutes, or I did not define it as within 1 day.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. In other words, if John Doe deposits a check, and 5 days later, it is an out-of-State check, and 5 days later, the bank decides, well, we are going to invoke this, can they after 5 or 6 days?

Mr. LAFALCE. I think 5 days would be blatantly unreasonable. I do not think it would be prompt whatsoever.

Admittedly, I do not put the specific period of time within the amendment that disclosure must be given, that the depository institution would be acting under the Shumway amendment.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Reclaiming my time, who makes the decision as to what is a prompt notification?

Mr. LAFALCE. The regulatory agency.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. The Federal Reserve Board would have to make a decision in each and every instance?

Mr. LAFALCE. Yes; as to whether or not the bank had acted appropriately, yes.

However, I would point out that there has not been one complaint by any constituent, to my knowledge, of any member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, of any of the regulations or laws passed by any of the States.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Reclaiming my time, and I would ask the gentleman to recognize the fact that this is my time, not his.

Mr. LAFALCE. I recognize that fact.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I appreciate that and I am not going to object strenuously to the amendment. As far as I am concerned, it can be accepted or we can go by voice vote.

However, in my books, this further clouds the issue because now we say there is going to be a disclosure requirement. However, we do not know who, when, how, why. And frankly, we now mess up the consumer even more and, of course, you still have the words in there that say reason to believe. And of course, you have added one factor now, and that is notification, and invoice costs here are going to be picked up. You talk about costs to the consumer, this will certainly increase the costs.

For that reason, as I say, I will not oppose this amendment being offered. I really feel that it further cripples the Shumway amendment, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY], as amended.

The question was taken; and the chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, if we can get agreement to ask for a Record vote, I will not object to the vote on the basis of a quorum not being present. In that way we will expedite the proceedings.

Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was refused.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I have no alternative but to make a point of order that a quorum is not present and object to the vote and ask for a recorded vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would advise the gentleman that a recorded vote has been refused by Members standing on the request for a recorded vote. The Chair has announced that an insufficient number has arisen.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I object to that vote on the ground that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island can now question the presence of a quorum. If the gentleman is prepared to make that point, the Chair will consider his point of order.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Rhode Island makes a point of order that a quorum is not present and objects to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, a Member cannot object to the vote on the ground a quorum is not present. He can make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can make the point of order that a quorum is not present. A recorded vote has been refused, the Chair will point out. A division vote could be taken after the quorum is established, but the Committee has already determined by standing with an insufficient number as to the question of an electronically recorded vote.

The question now is on the presence of a quorum and the Chair notes that a quorum is not present.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

The following Members responded to their names:

The CHAIRMAN. Three hundred five Members have answered to their names, a quorum is present, and the Committee will resume its business.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ST GERMAIN) there were—ayes 87, noes 125.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. ST GERMAIN and Mr. SHUMWAY.

The Committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 112, noes 121.

So the amendment, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the pending measure, H.R. 2443, a bill to help consumers by ending the so-called float game in consumer banking. The float game harms consumers by allowing financial institutions to withhold funds from them for up to 2 weeks, on grounds that the checks might bounce. Meanwhile these same institutions earn interest by lending the money to others.

H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act, which I support, was reported by the House Banking Committee on November 20 by voice vote. Earlier, I voted in the Financial Institution's Subcommittee on November 13 to report this bill by a vote of 23 to 6.

Mr. Chairman, there is some need to tighten up this bill. I regret that the rule making this bill in order today fails to allow amendments other than those printed in the RECORD before the rule even was made known to Members. This is not a way to start a new legislative session, especially in view of the troubled history of the Rules Committee last session.

Nebraska's bankers especially are concerned over the failure of H.R. 2443 to permit the good faith exception enacted by States legislating check-hold, funds availability law. While we can argue over whether 2 days or 3 days is the correct national check-hold standard for local checks, we ought to give local banks a good-judgment, reasonable-caution exception in the face of fraud, bankruptcy, and check-kiting schemes.

To illustrate, Lincoln banks recently were hit with a check-kiting scheme resulting in a $16,000 loss when the daughter of a local family got over her head into a small business venture. She thereupon allegedly kited three separate accounts over 7 or 8 days, manipulating $16,000 from the Lincoln bank before caught. Her father stepped in and made good in the bank's case; but a local savings and loan didn't fare so well, due to less costly recordkeeping capacities.

To argue the other side, the check of a daughter of a prominent Lincoln banking family was held for 2 weeks in a Chicago bank when she began school, working hardship and creating considerable, justifiable anger. That example is chosen from a banking family, but it illustrates a very common problem. That illustrates one reason why I support today's bill, H.R. 2443.

Mr. Chairman, as reported, this bill limits to 6 days the amount of time a bank can take to clear all checks, and to 2 days the time to clear local checks. As reported, this schedule would be suspended if unacceptable levels of check fraud losses were found to occur, H.R. 2443 also provides next day availability for cash deposits, checks under $100, Government checks and wire transfers. Within 3 years, the bill would require out-of-State checks to be cleared in 3 days and local checks on the next business day after deposit.

The Shumway amendment, if adopted, will allow banks to hold a check for a longer period when the checkwriter or depositor is believed to be on the brink of bankruptcy or if the check involves fraud or kiting. Adoption of this amendment, which I supported in full committee when it lost on a 17 to 28 vote, will help allay fears of excessive risk to depository institutions and excessive bank regulation.

Five States already have legislation requiring expedited funds-availability schedules, and 15 others are expected to consider similar bills this year. Under this bill, the States would be free to establish hold-period schedules more favorable to consumers than under H.R. 2443.

Mr. Chairman, this Federal banking legislation is long overdue and comes in response to a recognized need to provide consumers with needed protection against unreasonably long delays in check clearing and, thus, the availability of their funds in a timely fashion.

H.R. 2443 correctly, in my judgment, is premised on the principle that bank customers are entitled to have access to their funds as quickly as modern technology will allow.

This legislation represents progress for banking consumers. Most Nebraska banks will have no difficulty meeting its requirements; nor will banker in most parts of this Nation. The maximum amount subject under the bill to the availability schedules is $5,000 per day in the aggregate.

As an added protection, in those instances where the Federal Reserve Board determines that a depository institution "is experiencing" unacceptable check-related fraud losses, additional exceptions may be granted.

While I am concerned about the potential passthrough costs to consumers, I shall do what I can as a member of the Banking Committee to keep a close watch on the implementation of this bill by the Federal Reserve. I encourage my colleagues to support the passage of this act.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WYLIE

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WYLIE: On page 19, line 11, insert after "Act" the following: "and to preserve the soundness of and prevent abuses of the payments system".

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, if the Members are for safety and soundness in the payments mechanism, then they will support this amendment. My amendment is simply a clarifying amendment to that section of H.R. 2443 regarding the regulatory responsibility of the Federal Reserve Board for our Nation's payments system.

The Fed has asked for this amendment. There is no doubt in my mind that the Federal Reserve will assume the responsibility for safety and soundness of the payments mechanism anyway, if the broad language of section 6(b) is enacted into law and, in my opinion, the Federal Reserve should do so, regardless of the outcome of my amendment.

But my amendment would make it very specific. And, in fairness, Mr. Chairman, I have borrowed this amendment from the distinguished chairman of the Banking Committee, Mr. ST GERMAIN. My amendment is identical to language which we offered in subcommittee and then later withdrew.

Mr. Chairman, testimony from the Association of Reserve City Bankers and the Federal Reserve supported the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island, and the chairman himself said:

We are putting in a requirement that there has to be a finding on the safety and soundness of the payment system, which I think is a rather important criteria that the Fed would have to address.

Continuing, he noted "the potential for an adverse effect on safety and soundness is out there."

I think the chairman of the full committee is absolutely correct, and I think we owe it to our constituents to ensure that the Federal Reserve preserves the safety and soundness of our payments mechanism.

This point was underscored by an unfortunate event involving a serious operational problem last year, which required the Federal Reserve Board of New York to extend a sizable discount window advance to a large banking institution in New York.

Federal Reserve Board Vice Chairman Preston Martin responded, in a letter to me, that:

This occurrence underscores the need for the Federal Reserve to take all necessary and reasonable steps to ensure the safety, soundness and integrity of the payments system.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I ask: How can any Member oppose an amendment to ensure that the Federal Reserve maintains and preserves the safety and soundness of our payments system?

An "aye" vote is a vote for the safety and soundness of our Nation's enviable system of clearing checks, and I urge adoption of my clarifying amendment.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Ohio knows, at the full committee markup I offered a similar amendment to that being offered at this point by my colleague from Ohio. After 1 hour of debate, it became clear to me that the Federal Reserve Board was not able to make a convincing case, and their representatives were given the opportunity, right there in the markup session, to respond to committee inquiries during the markup.

Mr. Chairman, let me repeat: The gentleman from Ohio correctly stated that I advocated a similar amendment in committee. And let me say, I did so at the request of the Federal Reserve Board. Now, in the full committee markup session, members of the committee began questioning the effect of this amendment and the necessity for it. In order to be as helpful as possible to the Federal Reserve Board, I allowed their brilliant, erudite, knowledgeable counsel and members—not members of the Fed, but the staff—to come to the committee table and to explain the amendment and to make the arguments for the amendment.

Very frankly, I have never seen such a dismal failure in my 26 years here.

For that reason, I withdrew the amendment.

Now, I feel that if this amendment should be considered it should be considered in conjunction with H.R. 20. The problem of daylight overdrafts access to the payment system by unregulated holding companies should be dealt with in H.R. 20.

Now, yesterday, before the Rules Committee, as was stated by the Rules Committee chairman earlier today, I urged the Rules Committee to grant a rule on H.R. 20 in an expeditious manner, noting the fact that the committee completed action on the bill on June 12, 1985.

I also made reference to yesterday's Dimension case decided by the Supreme Court that makes urgent need for action on H.R. 20.

Reluctantly, I must oppose this amendment and say to him that at the appropriate time it should be offered to H.R. 20. As a matter of fact, I think it would be wonderful if the gentleman were to withdraw the amendment at this point, and we will consider it in H.R. 20, where it properly belongs.

Would the gentleman care to give that some serious consideration? I tried, the gentleman knows, in committee.

Mr. WYLIE. I appreciate the position in which the chairman finds himself here, and I would like to do that, but I think the issue of safety and soundness of our payments system is one that ought to be brought up at every step of the process.

If the chairman would yield for one further statement, after the hearing, I received a letter from Preston Martin, the Vice Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. This is not a staff member, Mr. Chairman. I do not know if the chairman got a copy of this or not. I should have supplied him with one if he did not. But he said the need for the Federal Reserve to take all necessary and reasonable steps to ensure the safety and soundness and integrity of the payments system is in this bill, and, therefore, we suggest that this amendment be offered again.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Well, I would say to the gentleman I do not like labeling this "safety and soundness." If that were the case, the payment system would have collapsed a long time ago. It has done well without this amendment. We do not need it today. We should consider it on H.R. 20, and then determine whether we even need it then. But as of the present time, I repeat, we have gone all this time without this amendment, the safety and soundness of the payment system has not been in jeopardy. I do not think it will be, between now and the time we address H.R. 20 on the floor of the House. For that reason, I ask for a "no" vote on the amendment. I yield back the balance of my time, and I hope we can get to a vote on this amendment expeditiously.

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, how can you be opposed to a motherhood provision of safety and soundness? You can be opposed to it when it is in here for a purpose other than safety and soundness.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is for one purpose, and that is to give the Federal Reserve unfair control over companies who own nonbank banks.

There was a provision offered in the first bill known as 5(g). The whole purpose of it was that Federal Reserve could restrict banks from being in the payment system. And it was done for the purpose of keeping owners of nonbank banks, which is an issue completely unrelated to this bill, from accepting deposits of the institutions that owned it.

Just to give you an example, the Federal Reserve was using this safety and soundness as a possible provision whereby it could restrict owners of nonbank banks, such as Sears Roebuck, from actually using their nonbank bank as a depository for its receipts.

Now, there was a lot of opposition to that for several reasons. No. 1, it was not germane to this bill. This was an expedited funds bill. It has no relation to the payment system. They knew that that provision was going to be defeated. So to get around that provision, which I said was not germane—and if it comes up today, I will offer a point of order objection that it is not germane—but to get around that provision, they put this motherhood provision for safety and soundness.

My colleagues, the Federal Reserve was unable to answer the question why they needed the provision. At hearings we heard from staff members of the Fed. They could not answer the question why they wanted to insert safety and soundness. The chairman of our committee, who offered the amendment to accommodate the Federal Reserve, after nearly 2 hours of debate and questions, voluntarily withdrew this amendment because they did not make a case for it.

I respect my colleague from Ohio; I respect him trying to carry the water for the Federal Reserve, but they have not made their case for this amendment, and I strongly hope that you will not let a nongermane issue creep in here at this point. It should be defeated.

Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNARD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LaFALCE. The gentleman from Georgia makes two arguments, basically. First, that the amendment is dangerous for the reasons he advances. I am not sure that the gentleman is correct in that. He may be correct.

If he is incorrect, I suggest that his other argument is certainly correct, and that is that no valid case has been made for the good that would be accomplished by the amendment. To me, the amendment is either, if the gentleman from Georgia is correct, dangerous or, if he is incorrect, if not dangerous, it then becomes merely superfluous.

In any event, it ought to be defeated because it is either, A, superfluous or, B, dangerous.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNARD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WYLIE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment goes into a section which is entitled, "Regulatory Responsibility of the Board for the Payment System. Responsibility for the payment system in order to carry out the provisions of this act, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve shall have the responsibility to regulate," and so forth.

Then I say, and "reserve the soundness of and prevent abuses of the payment system." There is nothing in there that says anything about any nonbank banks. Now, in the Dimension case, which was decided yesterday, it was held that the Comptroller of the Currency could, if he wanted to, grant nonbank bank charters and the Federal Reserve was wrong when it said that NOW accounts, for example, are deposits which would be covered by the present law defining a bank.

What I am saying is that we are covering NOW accounts in this bill and we ought to go further and say that if the Dimension case is applicable, we ought to preserve the safety and soundness and prevent abuse in the payment system with respect to NOW accounts.

Mr. BARNARD. I would respectfully ask the gentleman: What reasons did the Fed give for putting in this provision? What examples were given where safety and soundness has been an issue?

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Martin gave me an example of a case out of New York last year, which is referred to as the Bank of New York's Operational Problem, and he indicated in there that because the computer systems were down for awhile, that there was about to be a $20-billion shortfall in the payment system. The Federal Reserve, in a case like that, had to come to the rescue. He is apprehensive that in cases which or in other types of transaction accounts which are referred to in this bill that the same thing could happen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNARD] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BARNARD was allowed to proceed for 4 additional minutes.)

Mr. BARNARD. I compliment the Fed on what they did in that instance, and that is what they should have done. That is already in the law. That did not have to be changed.

Mr. WYLIE. But we are changing the law today.

Mr. BARNARD. I know it, and here is why we are changing the law. For this particular reason: In 5g, which was withdrawn, here is the language that they are seeking to get in this bill.

"In the case of any depository institution which is an affiliate or an unregulated holding company," that is an unregulated financial institution that owns a nonbank bank of which there are many and which we should address. The chairman of the committee is correct: H.R. 20 should come before this House for consideration. We should close the nonbank bank loophole. But until we do that we should not do this type of language.

No check or other negotiable instrument which is drawn, made or endorsed by such holding company or any other affiliate of such holding company may be accepted or otherwise handled by such depository institution or clearing of such check or instrument or for any purpose related to any function of the payment system.

Behind that, behind the safety and soundness they could regulate that nonregulated financial institutions which are legally today owning nonbank banks could not use those nonbank banks for their own payment system, and that is wrong.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNARD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WYLIE. Our banking system has been the envy of the world and it is the best banking system ever organized among men. It is one of the reasons, it is the oil which keeps our economy moving. I think anytime that there is likely to be an impact on the payment system as to safety and soundness, that we ought to be alerted ahead of time to try to do something about that. That is the only thrust and purpose of my amendment.

Mr. BARNARD. Let me say this: First of all, every bank is still, whether it is a nonbank bank or otherwise, is still under the control of State banking regulators, the Comptroller of the Currency, or the Federal Reserve. Those safeguards are still there. We do not have to put that in this particular bill. So I am saying that the purpose of this is not what it appears to be. I am convinced of that and I have heard of no arguments to this degree at this point which would correct that.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNARD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROEMER. I think the gentleman from Georgia is correct in his observation insofar as the testimony before committee as the need for this kind of amendment related to nonbank banks. The chairman of our committee has stated here again today, and I join both with him and with you, to state that we ought to have H.R. 20 before this body so we can discuss the implications of H.R. 20. That is, nonbank banks.

This amendment would be in order then; I think it should be considered then, not now.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNARD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VENTO. I want to thank the gentleman for his statement. I rise in opposition to this amendment. I understand the importance of safety and soundness, but it has no place in terms of this expedited payment system that we are considering here today. This is really an attempt by the Federal Reserve Board to piggyback onto this bill and I think it confuses the issue beyond recognition. I would hope that Members would defeat it here and consider it on its merits when we get to the bill and the subject to which it is related and not muddy the waters as has been done here today.

No one has offered an explanation of why this is necessary on this bill. I have not heard it; I do not think it has been offered. It has not been offered in committee; it is not being offered today in the Committee of the Whole. I think this amendment deserves to be deferred and defeated today.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

Messrs. NIELSON of Utah, TAYLOR, GILMAN, and ECKART of Ohio changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BARTLETT

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. BARTLETT: On page 18, line 15 add a new section 5(h) as follows:

(h) DOUBTFUL COLLECTABILITY.—In accordance with regulations of the Board, sections 3(b), 4(c) and 4(d) shall not apply in instances where the receiving depository institution has reason to doubt the collectability of funds for a check (e.g. suspicion of bankruptcy of the drawer of a check, suspicion of fraud);

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is quite similar to the amendment that was offered and debated earlier by my good friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY]. It is similar in that it provides for a good faith exception for a financial institution that has reason to doubt the collectability of a check.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am offering this amendment in the spirit of giving the House an opportunity to have a rollcall vote on an amendment that is similar to this; that is to say, and it was no one's fault, but for a series of procedural reasons on the Shumway amendment earlier the House ended up not obtaining a rollcall vote and the final teller vote was a vote, as I recall, of 121 to 111 and that vote, Mr. Chairman, first was so close as to cast in doubt what a majority of this House would feel on that amendment; and second, that leaves about 200 Members of the House uncounted and therefore unvoted, something slightly less than 200 Members.

So Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that there is not a lot of reason to spend much time debating this amendment. It has been well debated under the Shumway version earlier. We have heard all the arguments.

This would simply provide an additional exception for the mandatory availability schedule for situations where the receiving institution has reason to believe that a check may be uncollectable. Those reasons would include fraud or bankruptcy of a party to a check.

So Mr. Chairman, in the interest of the people who are here voting for a vote, I yield back the balance of my time.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SHUMWAY TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BARTLETT

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHUMWAY to the amendment offered by Mr. BARTLETT: At the end of the amendment add to following: ": Provided further, That sections 3(b), 4(c), and 4(d) shall not apply to a check if the receiving depository institution reasonably believes that the drawer or drawee of the check has become, or is about to become, subject to bankruptcy, receivership, or when the receiving depository institution reasonably believes that a situation involving fraud or kiting exists. In such situations, the depository institution shall notify the drawer and drawee no later than the close of the next business day of the check when it takes action pursuant to this provision."

Mr. SHUMWAY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, during debate on the amendment which I offered earlier in the afternoon, there was considerable concern expressed on both sides of the aisle about the kind of notice that would have to be afforded to a depositor whose check would be held for one of the three specified purposes in my amendment.

The amendment as proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE] stated simply that notice shall be given promptly. Since that was a matter of concern to some Members of the House, Mr. Chairman, I have redrafted the amendment to provide that notice shall be given no later than the close of the business day following. I think that ties down very well the concern that many Members have expressed. It still allows for the discretion that I think is so important to be exercised by financial institutions and I think it does improve the bill considerably.

For those reasons, Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I will be very brief.

Mr. Chairman, what we have here, and I commend the Minority, is a very ingenuous method of revisiting the Shumway amendment that was voted on by a teller vote. We will now have a record vote, a rollcall vote on this amendment.

I would urge that we again defeat the Shumway amendment so that we can expeditiously complete the bill, take care of the consumers and for those consuming Congressmen who have to go home and face their constituents, we will accommodate them; so I would hope that we could not proceed to a vote on this amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word and I rise in support of the Shumway amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I will not take 5 minutes. I have reviewed the Shumway amendment. It does precisely what the gentleman said. It is a way for the House to be recorded on this good faith issue and I urge Members to vote for the vote on a rollcall vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 156, noes 146, answered "present" 1, not voting 131, as follows:

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. SHUMWAY

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would require of the gentleman from California, was the amendment printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SHUMWAY. The answer is yes, Mr. Chairman, the amendment was printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. SHUMWAY: Strike all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 1. This Act may be cited as the "Fair Deposit Availability Act of 1986".

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. As used in this Act—

(1) the term "depository institution" means—

(A) Any insured bank or domestic branch as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act or any bank which is eligible to make application to become an insured bank under section 5 of such Act, other than a foreign bank having an insured or uninsured branch;

(B) any mutual savings bank as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act or any bank which is eligible to make application to become an insured bank under section 5 of such Act;

(C) any savings bank as defined in section 3 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act or any bank which is eligible to make application to become an insured bank under section 5 of such Act;

(D) any insured credit union as defined in section 101 of the Federal Credit Union Act or any credit union which is eligible to make application to become an insured credit union pursuant to section 201 of such Act;

(E) any member as defined in section 2 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act; and

(F) any insured institution as defined in section 401 of the National Housing Act or any institution which is eligible to make application to become an insured institution under section 403 of such Act;

(2) the term "deposit account" means an account in a depository institution on which the account holder is permitted to make withdrawals by negotiable or transferable instruments, payment orders of withdrawal, telephone transfers, or other similar items for the purpose of making payments or transfers to third persons or others. Such term includes demand deposit accounts, negotiable order of withdrawal accounts, share draft accounts, savings, deposits, and share accounts. Such term does not include time deposits;

(3) the term "Board" means the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System; and

(4) the term "check or similar instrument" means a check, negotiable order of withdrawal, share draft, money order, or similar instrument, but does not include noncash items.

DISCLOSURE OF FUND AVAILABILITY POLICIES

SEC. 3. (a) Before opening a deposit account, a depository institution shall provide a written disclosure to the potential customer of its general policy with respect to when a customer may withdraw funds deposited by check or similar instrument into the customer's deposit account. A depository institution also shall provide a written disclosure to the potential customer of all fees and charges that can be assessed against deposit accounts. In the case of a deposit account which was opened prior to the effective date of this section, the depository institution shall include such disclosure with the first regularly scheduled mailing pertaining to the account which occurs after such effective date (but not later than 90 days after such effective date) unless the depository institution has provided a disclosure which meets the requirements of this section prior to such effective date.

(b) Each depository institution shall—

(1) post at each location where its employees receive deposits a clear and conspicuous notice setting forth its general policy with respect to when a customer may withdraw funds deposited by check or similar instrument; and

(2) mail at least annually a brief reminder with respect to an account that deposits by check or similar instrument may not be available for immediate withdrawal.

(c) Each owner of an automatic or electronic terminal shall provide at each terminal location where deposits may be made a brief reminder that deposits by check or similar instrument may not be available for immediate withdrawal.

(d) Any change to a depository institution's general policy with respect to when a customer may withdraw funds deposited by check or similar instrument into the customer's deposit account, or any change in the fees and charges to be assessed against a deposit account other than a change which expedites the availability of such funds, may take effect only after the depository institution has provided notice of such changes to the customer.

(e) Each depository institution shall provide disclosure, consistent with the disclosures required under subsection (a), by telephone of its general policy with respect to when a customer may withdraw funds deposited by check or similar instrument into a customer's account upon the telephone request of any person.

(f) The Board shall prescribe regulations to carry out this section. These regulations may contain such definitions, classifications, differentiations, or other provisions, and may provide for such adjustments and exceptions for any class of transactions, as the Board determines are necessary to effectuate the purposes of this section, to prevent circumvention or evasion of this section, or to facilitate compliance with this section. The regulations of the Board shall require all disclosures, statements, and notices provided to be clear and conspicuous and in language that can be readily understood.

(g) A depository institution that does not begin to compute interest or dividends on funds deposited by check or similar instrument to an interest bearing deposit account or a time deposit on or before the date on which the depository institution receives provisional credit for the deposit (or if provisional credit is given on a nonbusiness day, the next business day) shall provide a written disclosure, within the time periods required under subsection (a), with respect to when the institution begins to compute interest on such funds.

(h) The Board shall publish model disclosure forms and clauses for common transactions to facilitate compliance with the disclosure requirements of this section and to aid customers by utilizing readily understandable language. Nothing in this Act requires the use of any such model form or clause prescribed by the Board under this section. A depository institution shall be deemed to be in compliance with the provisions of this section if it (1) uses any appropriate model form or clause as published by the Board, or (2) uses any such model form or clause and changes it by (A) deleting any information which is not required by this Act, or (B) rearranging the format.

(i) Model disclosure forms and clauses shall be adopted by the Board after notice duly given in the Federal Register and an opportunity for public comment in accordance with section 553 of title 5, United States Code.

INTEREST ON DEPOSITS

SEC. 4. For the purpose of computing the amount of interest or dividends payable with respect to an interest bearing deposit account or a time deposit, a depository institution may not delay beginning to compute interest on funds deposited by check or similar instrument to such an account beyond the date on which that depository institution receives provisional credit for the check or similar instrument (or if provisional credit is given on a nonbusiness day, on the next business day) unless the computation of interest begins at a later date for all deposits, including cash deposits, made to the account or deposit. Nothing in this section requires the payment of interest with respect to funds deposited by check or similar instrument which is returned unpaid.

IMPROVED CLEARING PROCEDURES

SEC. 5. (a) Not later than 18 months after the date of enactment of this Act, the Board shall publish for comment a regulation for the purpose of improving the check clearing system used by depository institutions by expediting the process for returning checks or other means in order to achieve the goal of—

(1) making deposits of funds by check or similar instrument drawn on local depository institutions available for withdrawal upon the expiration of one business day after deposit, and

(2) making deposits of funds by check or similar instrument drawn on other depository institutions available for withdrawal upon the expiration of three business days after deposit. This subsection does not apply to any check or similar instrument which poses a serious risk of loss to a depository institution.

(b) In prescribing the regulation under subsection (a), the Board shall consider—

(1) adopting a uniform endorsement standard;

(2) providing for direct notification of returning checks and similar instruments to the depository institution of first deposit;

(3) providing for direct return of checks and similar instruments to the depository institution of first deposit;

(4) providing for return of all checks and similar instruments through the Federal Reserve System's clearinghouse;

(5) extending limits for returns;

(6) establishing schedules for the availability of funds deposited by checks and similar instruments;

(7) prescribing the availability of funds deposited by checks and similar instruments based on the nature of the account to which the deposit was made or the nature of the account holder;

(8) the use of electronic means of collecting and returning checks;

(9) providing for check truncation;

(10) the establishment of an automated return system;

(11) charging a depository institution based upon notification that a check or similar instrument will be presented for payment;

(12) creating incentives for depository institutions to return unpaid items promptly to the depository institution of first deposit; and

(13) keeping the costs of any improvements to be implemented to a minimum.

(c) The regulation prescribed under subsection (a) shall become effective not later than 36 months after the date of enactment of this section. Each depository institution shall comply with the provisions of such regulation.

(d) The Board shall establish an Expedited Funds Availability Council (hereinafter referred to as the "Council") to advise and consult with the Board in the exercise of its functions under this section. The Council shall consist of—

(1) the Comptroller of the Currency or his delegate;

(2) the Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation of his delegate;

(3) the Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board or his delegate;

(4) the Chairman of the National Credit Union Administration Board or his delegate;

(5) two members of the Consumer Advisory Council designated by the Board;

(6) one representative from the users of payment systems services; and

(7) one representative from the providers of payment systems services in competition with the services offered by the Federal Reserve System.

The Council shall meet from time to time at the call of the Board.

AVAILABILITY OF CERTAIN FUNDS

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Treasury shall by regulation require that funds deposited by a check drawn on the Treasury of the United States, which is first endorsed for deposit by a customer who has an established relationship, as defined by the Board, with the depository institution shall be available for withdrawal by that customer not later than the date when the depository institution is given provisional credit for that check or, if provisional credit is given on a nonbusiness day, on the next business day.

ADMINISTRATIVE ENFORCEMENT

SEC. 7. (a) Compliance with the requirements imposed under this Act shall be enforced under—

(1) section 8 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act in the case of—

(A) national banks, by the Comptroller of the Currency;

(B) member banks of the Federal Reserve System (other than national banks), by the Board; and

(C) banks insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (other than members of the Federal Reserve System and Federal savings banks), by the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation;

(2) section 5(d) of the Home Owner's Loan Act of 1933, section 407 of the National Housing Act, and section 17 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board (acting directly or through the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation), in the case of any institution subject to any of those provisions; and

(3) the Federal Credit Union Act, by the Administrator of the National Credit Union Administration with respect to any Federal credit union or insured credit union.

(b) For the purpose of the exercise by any agency referred to in subsection (a) of this section of its powers under any Act referred to in that subsection, a violation of any requirement imposed under this Act shall be deemed to be a violation of a requirement imposed under that Act. In addition to its powers under any provision of law specifically referred to in subsection (a) of this section, each of the agencies referred to in that subsection may exercise, for the purpose of enforcing compliance with any requirement imposed under this Act, any other authority conferred on it by law.

(c) Except to the extent that enforcement of the requirements imposed under this Act is specifically committed to some other Government agency under subsection (a) of this section, the appropriate State regulatory authority shall enforce such requirements.

(d) The authority of the Board to issue regulations under this Act does not impair the authority of any other authority designated in this section to make rules respecting its own procedures in enforcing compliance with requirements imposed under this Act.

CIVIL LIABILITY

SEC. 8. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this section, any depository institution which fails to comply with any requirement imposed under section 3 (other than subsection (e)), 4, or 6 with respect to any person is liable to such person in an amount equal to the sum of—

(1) any actual damage sustained by such person as a result of the failure;

(2)(A) in the case of an individual action such additional amount as the court may allow, except that the liability under this subparagraph shall not be less than $50 nor greater than $500; or

(B) in the case of a class action, such amount as the court may allow, except that as to each member of the class no minimum recovery shall be applicable, and the total recovery under this subparagraph in any class action or series of class actions arising out of the same failure to comply by the same depository institution shall not be more than the lesser of $500,000 or 1 per centum of the net worth of the depository institution; and

(3) in the case of any successful action to enforce the foregoing liability, the costs of the action, together with a reasonable attorney's fee as determined by the court.

In determining the amount of award in any class action, the court shall consider, among other relevant factors, the amount of any actual damages awarded, the frequency and persistence of failures of compliance, the resources of the depository institution, the number of persons adversely affected, and the extent to which the failure of compliance was intentional.

(b) A depository institution may not be held liable in any action brought under this section for a violation of section 3, 4, or 6 if the violation was not intentional and resulted from a bona fide error notwithstanding the maintenance of procedures reasonably adapted to avoid any such error. Examples of a bona fide error include, but are not limited to, clerical, calculation, computer malfunction and programming, and printing errors, except that an error of legal judgment with respect to a person's obligations under this Act is not a bona fide error.

(c) Any action under this section may be brought in any United States district court, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction, within one year from the date of the occurrence of the violation.

(d) No provision of this section imposing any liability shall apply to any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any rule, regulation, or interpretation thereof by the Board or in conformity with any interpretation or approval by an official or employee of the Federal Reserve System duly authorized by the Board to issue such interpretations or approvals under such procedures as the Board may prescribe therefor, notwithstanding that after such act or omission has occurred, such rule, regulation, interpretation, or approval is amended, rescinded, or determined by judicial or other authority to be invalid for any reason.

EFFECT ON CHECK ACCEPTANCE POLICIES AND OTHER LAWS

SEC. 9. (a) Nothing in this Act—

(1) prevents a depository institution, in accordance with the policy of such depository institution, from making funds available for withdrawal in a shorter period of time than is provided in this Act or in regulations adopted by the Board; and

(2) affects a depository institution's right—

(A) to accept or reject a check for deposit; or

(B) if a check for deposit and the depository institution has made provisional settlement with the depositor, pursuant to law to—

(i) revoke the provisional settlement given by the depository institution;

(ii) charge back the depositor's account; or

(iii) claim a refund of such provisional credit.

(b) Except as provided in subsection (a), the provisions of this Act or the regulations of the Board prescribed under this Act shall supersede the provisions of any State law which the Board determines to be inconsistent with the provisions of this Act or such regulation, but only to the extent of the inconsistency.

IMPROVING PAYMENT MECHANISMS

SEC. 10. Not later than one year after the implementation of any regulations under section 5 of this Act, the Board shall prepare a study and submit its findings to the Congress on the effect of improvements and changes in the payment system, including—

(1) the effect of the changes made by section 5 of this Act, and the advisability and feasibility of further changes;

(2) an assessment of improvements that can be made in the check collection system, including improved procedures for the return of unpaid items, reduction of costs, reduction in the number of returned checks, greater speed and efficiency in the check collection and return system, utilization of more efficient technology, and parity of treatment of depository institutions; and

(3) an assessment of the use of electronics in payments and of the need for improvements in the way the payments system provides services so as to insure efficient and affordable services, including the possible development of additional electronic services.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 11. Except as provided in section 5, this Act takes effect upon the expiration of twelve months following its enactment.

On page 18, line 15, add a new subsection (h) to section 5 as follows:

"(h) Sections 3(b), 4(c) and 4(d) shall not apply to a check if the receiving depository institution reasonably believes that the drawer or drawee of the check has become, or is about to become, subject to bankruptcy, receivership or similar proceeding, or when the receiving depository institution reasonably believes that a situation involving fraud or kiting exists."

Mr. SHUMWAY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, at the outset, I would like to thank the chairman and thank all Members. I know the hour is late and I apologize for prolonging the debate on this issue. But it is a matter of great importance to banks, to consumers, to all of us as Americans, and I think it does deserve the careful attention of all Members. And this amendment in particular, I think, is one that is important for us to consider.

This amendment parallels a companion piece of legislation which has been introduced in the other body known as S. 1841. It is a substitute for the pending bill which would require the free-market approach requiring notice be given by the institution to depositors of various schedules and fees they charge.

We have had some discussions here during the debate about the requirements of giving notice to depositors if there is going to be any kind of a hold exercised upon a check. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that with all of the advances in modern technology, and given the complexity of the payment system in terms of banks and other institutions, differences in geography and differences in competitive makeup, I think it is unwise for Congress to attempt to legislate an inflexible, absolute rigid hold schedule.

The problems in the current check-clearing system really are twofold. One, a failure of the depository institution to disclose to their customers their hold policies that a bank or institution may have; and second, the archaic and highly manual return system that is now employed in processing checks and transporting them across the country.

This substitute amendment addresses both of these issues in a very flexible and effective manner and protects the interests of both the depository institution and their customers.

Again I point out the two problems. One deals with notice to customers and the other deals with the very archaic system that we use for clearing checks.

This substitute, I submit, addresses both of those concerns, and does so in a way that allows flexibility and yet protection for both financial institutions and their customers.

The substitute essentially gives the Fed 18 months for preliminary regulations and 3 years to promulgate a final regulation to reach a goal of reducing holding time to no more than 2 or 3 days for all checks that do not represent a serious risk of loss to the depository institution. The amendment also requires all depository institutions to disclose their hold periods to their customers, and to begin accruing interest on items deposited in interest-bearing accounts no later than the date when provisional credit is granted to that institution, and this notice shall be given by writing, by posting, by telephone, by personal presentation when the contract of deposit is made.

This approach, ladies and gentlemen, provides incentives for the more rapid handling of checks as well as the return process of the system. It provides the necessary flexibility by delegating authority to the Fed to find the most expeditious and efficient means to speed up the check-processing system.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHUMWAY. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I would like to compliment my friend from California for offering this substitute. It truly is now a market-oriented approach to a problem that every single one of us wants to solve.

There is not a Member of this House who wants to have the banks making money on the float, and with full disclosure as this substitute offers, we will in fact be able to rectify that problem.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly support the substitute and compliment the gentleman for offering it.

Mr. SHUMWAY. I appreciate the comments of the gentleman from California.

Finally, let me say that this substitute provides the necessary protections against risk of loss for depository institutions, and at the same time it allows the consumer to know and to compare various institutions' current hold policies and to make a wise and informed decision. It moves us in the right direction. It is an approach that I think is flexible enough to serve our needs, and I urge its adoption by the House.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise in opposition to the substitute.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, in 1978 the Federal Reserve Board told the Committee on Banking that it was studying the problem of a float and the use of everybody's money by the banks when they deposit a check, in order to make money for the banks and to preclude the depositors using the money that they have earned.

Nineteen seventy-eight, that was 7 years ago. Two years ago we held hearings on the legislation before us. This past year we held extensive hearings on the legislation before us. We have a mandated schedule that says for the first 3 years you must give credit to people within 3 days, 3 business days, if within the area, 10 business days beyond. It says 3 years from now it should be the next business day and 4 business days if it is outside the State or the Federal Reserve clearinghouse district.

What does the substitute do? It says to the consumers, "By golly, you have waited since 1932, 50-some-odd years, you can wait another 3, 4, 5 years." It says, "No schedules, no required time within which to give you your money, to allow you the use of your money." Instead, it says 18 months from now regulations will be published; 36 months from now they will decide whether these regulations should be not only published but enacted and requirements made that banks pay people expeditiously, in a timely fashion, for deposits, allowing them the use of their deposits.

Ladies and gentlemen of the House, really and truly, I cannot see how anyone who has any concern for the consumers of his district and for this country can vote for this substitute. Five States already have enacted schedules either by statute or by regulation. Many other States are following suit. Are we, the Congress, going to say that if federally chartered institutions want to cop a plea they need not comply in those States where regulations or statutes are already in force and say to the people of this Nation, "The banks control the Congress, not the consumer?"

I say this is an anticonsumer substitute. I urge its defeat.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SCHUMER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I agree with the chairman of the committee. And I say to my colleagues briefly: So that this substitute, the Shumway substitute, is not confused with the previous Shumway amendment, the previous amendment said that if the bank felt in good faith it should not honor a check it would be allowed to hold the funds. That is something I did not support. It is a reasonable amendment. It did not kill the bill.

Make no mistake about it, this Shumway substitute kills the bill. This does nothing. The operative clause, if I might read it, is, "Not later than 18 months after the date of enactment the board shall publish a for-comment regulation for the purpose of improving check clearing." All it says to the Federal Reserve is improve it. Improve it a little bit? Improve it a lot? How would you do it?

Whether these regulations were to go in effect tomorrow, next year, or 10 years from now, this Congress would abrogate its responsibility, give all responsibility to the Federal Reserve Board, which has not done a good job protecting consumers. It leans too much in favor of the banks, and it would kill any hope that the consumers had of fairness. The substitue is a bill killer. A vote for this substitute is like defeating the bill.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, again I urge defeat of the substitute.

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. CARPER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

My colleagues, I rise in reluctant opposition to the amendment offered in good faith by the gentleman from California. I voted in favor of the gentleman's last amendment, as I think the gentleman knows. I think that amendment which was designed to protect the legitimate financial interests or the legitimate interests of financial institutions from fraud, check kiting, bankruptcy, made the bill a better bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Rhode Island has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. ST GERMAIN was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. CARPER. Will the gentleman continue to yield?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. CARPER. I thank the gentleman again for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I am not so favorably disposed toward this particular amendment. I would urge my colleagues to oppose it and defeat this amendment.

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARNARD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a couple of questions about this amendment. No. 1, was this amendment offered during the consideration of the Banking Committee?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. No, it was not.

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Chairman, I note that this amendment was printed in the RECORD of Wednesday, January 22.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. It is a substitute for the bill, it is not an amendment.

Mr. BARNARD. An entire substitute.

As I read this substitute, it is entirely a new bill, not presented before the Banking Committee.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. BARNARD. Is it true that this tracks a Senate bill that has been introduced in the other body?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I am given to understand that it does in part but not in toto.

Mr. BARNARD. Could I ask the gentleman, the author of the bill, has this bill been passed by the other body?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California in order to reply to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. SHUMWAY. If the gentleman will yield, I thank the gentleman for yielding. It has not been passed by the other body but it has been introduced in that body as S. 1481 by Senator DODD, it is exactly the same bill.

Mr. BARNARD. I would ask the chairman again, would not this amendment have fair consideration if this bill passes the House, and maybe that bill will pass the other body, and would it not be fair consideration to be considered in conference?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Well, I cannot speak for what the other body may do. But, by the same token, I say to the gentleman he made a good point. The gentleman who offers this substitute would be the first to object to any legislation or a substitute that goes as far as this does without consideration in the committee, and yet he now wants to consider it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Rhode Island has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. ST GERMAIN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, for that reason I say that I cannot understand why we should agree to it.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ST GERMAIN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAFALCE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

As the Chairman knows, I favor the concept of having the regulators determine what the prescribed period should be. However, upon a cursory examination of this substitute, I just think this is too vague and ambiguous, in only calling for them to issue regulations to be commented upon; too long a period of time; it is not detailed nor specific enough. For the fact that it was not offered in committee, we did not have ample time to consider it, and it seems too vague and ambiguous, I would urge defeat of the substitute at this time.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Chairman, I would urge defeat of the amendment and yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I know the hour is late on Thursday afternoon, but the Shumway substitute which he offers, I call to the attention of the entire House, in fact, resolves the problem that has been discussed by this committee during the debate on the amendment in committee and subcommittee and by the Committee of the Whole all afternoon. What the Shumway amendment does, and it is quite a courageous amendment to offer, it is against the tide on the House floor; it is an amendment that I think speaks for the consumers of this country to give the consumers a choice. The difference between the Shumway substitute and the committee bill is very, very plain. The Shumway substitute would leave the choice as to what type of account, what type of hold, if any, and what type of interest rate, and what type of cost to the consumer. And the consumer then is allowed to be a reasonable and reasoned and informed shopper. I would say to the gentlemen on the other side, the sponsors of the main bill, that there is a problem. There is a problem in this country with deposits that are held for too long. But the problem is the frustration of consumers who are not told about those holds and do not have an informed choice. The Shumway amendment resolves that problem because it ensures that consumers would then be informed when they open their account at every day subsequent to that opening with each deposit as to what their choices are. So a consumer then goes to their financial institution and is told, without having to ask under the Shumway substitute, is told what the policies are and what the costs would be and what the interest rate is for that account. Then if the consumer decides that that is not their package, they go across the street or down the street or across the way and find a financial institution that meets their specific needs.

Let me be very specific: This substitute provides for an informed choice so that a financial institution under this substitute could offer a higher interest rate with a longer hold, tell the depositor about it, and if that fits the depositor's needs, the depositor will accept that account, or the financial institution could offer no hold, offer immediate credit on all deposits with a lower interest rate to account for the additional cost. And if that fits the consumer need, then the consumer chooses that kind of account.

With the Shumway substitute the depositor is the king, the consumer is the king. With the committee bill the Government is the king, the regulators, as the gentleman from New York said, and I admire him a great deal, but he said it. He said he wanted to help the regulators make the decisions for the consumers of this country. I do not think when the Congress really examines this problem that they will conclude that that is the right way to solve it because it is not a solution. It creates a bigger problem. It says we are going to return to the days of no choice, that the Government is going to decide what rate, what date, hours of service, what accounts, what type of accounts. I know the gentleman would not add all of that, but that is the direction.

So I would implore the House to avoid the fashion of being heavy-handed, voting just for the title of the bill, to vote for the consumer, for the consumer choice, and for a disclosure substitute.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE CLERK TO MAKE CORRECTIONS IN ENGROSSMENT OF H.R. 2443, EXPEDITED FUNDS AVAILABILITY ACT

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossment of the bill, H.R. 2443 the Clerk be authorized to correct section numbers, punctuation, and cross references and to make such other technical and conforming changes as may be necessary to reflect the actions of the House in amending the bill, H.R. 2443.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. HUBBARD). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and include extraneous material, on the bill just considered and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I have taken this time for the purpose of inquiring of the distinguished majority leader about the program for the balance of the week and next week.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the distinguished minority leader yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the legislative business for this week has been concluded, and I will ask unanimous consent, when we conclude here, that we adjourn today to meet at noon on Monday.

On Monday we have scheduled the District of Columbia Revenue Bond Act. If there should be a recorded vote requested and ordered, we will postpone the vote until Tuesday.

On Tuesday, we will meet at noon. There will be two bills that we expect to consider under suspension of the rules. The first one is S. 1831, the Arms Export Control Act amendments, and the other is S. 1574, the smokeless tobacco bill. Then the House would recess until 8:30 p.m. on Tuesday and reconvene to receive the President of the United States at 9 o'clock in the evening for his annual State of the Union Address.

On Wednesday we will meet at 3 p.m. We will consider H.R. 3525, the single poll closing time for Presidential elections, under an open rule, with 1 hour of general debate.

On Thursday we will meet at 11 a.m. and consider H.R. 3492, protection and advocacy for mentally ill individuals. That is subject to the granting of a rule.

We do not expect the House to be in session on Friday.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

I would like to yield, if I might, at this moment to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT].

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to propound a question to the distinguished majority leader about the schedule in the summer months. There had been some difference between the House schedule in the summer and the schedule of the other body, and there had been some discussion perhaps of some change in the month of July. Could the distinguished leader give us any new information on that?

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to respond to that question, and I think this might be good news and welcome to those Members with young children in school.

We have decided that since the Senate is taking the Fourth of July recess through the 13th of July and we had originally scheduled ours only through the 6th, we will go ahead and schedule that July recess through the 13th, particularly in view of the fact that there is only a short recess in August scheduled. This will give Members with children an extra week to spend with their youngsters and with their families.

I am glad the gentleman asked that question, and I think it is useful to advise all Members in order that they might make their plans for that week.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for that information. As one of the Members with children still in school, high school and college, I want to express my appreciation. But I would like this to be remembered as the JACK BROOKS district work period since he is one of the parents that had such an interest in this effort.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS] will be deeply grateful for that. It was he, along with others—and particularly he—who agitated for this change in order that those young Members with younger children might be accommodated.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, if I might reclaim my time, it is only to say that I am happy to hear the response to the gentleman from Texas because the distinguished whip on the Republican side has been holding up the very important printing process of the little wallet-sized cards we carry to tell us when we are supposed to be here and when we have free time, either with our families or during district work periods. I would assume now from the gentleman's exchange here that he can proceed with that very important printing process.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I would say that the gentleman from Mississippi was very wise, because a friend of mine named THOMAS S. FOLEY, the majority whip, already has published what I hold in my hand, a card bearing the now outdated dates. Under normal circumstances, I expect the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY], the majority whip, might republish, but under Gramm-Rudman I am sure he is going to take a pen and go through each of those cards and scratch out the wrong date and write in the right one.

Mr. MICHEL. Well, of course, on the majority side it is always the advantage over there to know a little bit ahead of time what transpires across the aisle here, but knowing the good nature of the gentleman from Washington, I am sure that he will take the majority leader's recommendation and admonition and proceed to get those "babies" corrected, also attempting to live by the letter and spirit of Gramm-Rudman, which is going to transcend all the activities we have around here for the next 100 days, I suppose.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, JANUARY 27, 1986

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will now entertain requests for 1-minute speeches which were waived at the beginning of the day.

LEGISLATION EXEMPTING CERTAIN SPENDING CUTS UNDER GRAMM-RUDMAN

(Mr. ANDERSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation to exempt certain health, safety, and law enforcement agencies from the mandatory, across-the-board Gramm-Rudman spending cuts.

Specifically, my bill protects the Drug Enforcement Administration, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Federal Aviation Administration, Customs Service, and Coast Guard from the Gramm-Rudman budget ax.

Should we fail to modify Gramm-Rudman, we can expect pink slips to be handed out to air traffic controllers, drug enforcement personnel, border agents, and customs inspectors. I don't think any of us would want to see this happen.

If you agree that we should continue to fully fund those programs that successfully promote our constituents' health and safety, then I urge you to cosponsor my bill.

CAN GRAMM-RUDMAN REALLY WORK?

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, there is an inescapable correlation between the budget deficit and the cost of servicing the public debt. It is no accident that the public debt doubled during the past 5 years, just at the time when the cost of servicing it exploded—thanks to exorbitant interest rates. The bottom line is that the real cause of the budget deficit is neither our defense spending, nor our domestic spending. Rather, it is the regime of high interest rates that the Federal Reserve Board inaugurated in 1979—without the advice or consent of the Congress—when its leaders embraced the monetarist creed.

The problem cannot be solved by selective budget cuts or tax increases. To suggest that a balanced budget will bring down interest rates is to put the cart before the horse. It is to confuse cause and effect. It is to pretend that one can just as easily climb out of a hole as one can climb into it. But the fact remains that the budget deficit cannot be eliminated without eliminating its chief cause: the regime of high interest rates.

In calling for budget cuts and tax increases, while ignoring the Volcker coup d'etat of 1979, the Gramm-Rudman plan is trying to build on quicksand. It has no chance for success while it may bring more agony to the dynamic producers of our society; 15 years ago the Congress abdicated its constitutional powers and prerogatives "to coin money and regulate the value thereof." The result was that usurpers took over, started coining their own kind of money without regard to the requirements of integrity, equity, or honesty. The money-changers invaded the temple. Once the value of the dollar was destabilized, interest rates at double digits inevitably followed.

The real solution to the problem of budget deficits can only come after the Congress has reasserted its constitutional prerogatives, put an end to usurpation of its constitutional powers in redefining the value of the dollar in terms of gold. Once the dollar is so stabilized, the rate of interest will immediately return to a low and stable level. This will make it possible, once more, to bring the budget under control.

It is time to chase the money-changers out of the temple.

MANY KENTUCKIANS LOOK FORWARD TO END OF BINGHAM NEWS MONOPOLY

(Mr. HUBBARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, in Kentucky, The Courier-Journal, The Louisville Times, WHAS Radio, WHAS-TV and Standard Gravure Corp.—valued together at as much as $450 million—have been put up for sale following more than a year of a bitter family feud whereby the children of multimillionaire Barry Bingham, Sr., have taken turns in public criticizing each other and their father.

The headlines of the Bingham media empire's morning newspaper on January 10 read: "State's leaders are saddened by decision."

Typical of the one-sided news coverage by the newspapers, the only ones interviewed were admirers of the Binghams.

Only one western Kentuckian was interviewed—a former State representative who has a longtime newspaper background and is a Bingham family friend.

I could not go home to western Kentucky this weekend without telling it like it is.

Tens of thousands of Kentuckians are absolutely overjoyed with the possibility that the Bingham's news monopoly in Kentucky may come to an end in 1986.

The sale of the multimillion-dollar Bingham media empire is to Kentuckians today what the Chicago Bears team is to our Illinois neighbors.

REMEMBERING OUR HOSTAGES

(Mr. DORNAN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, while we were gone during the Christmas and New Year holidays, one of our hostages who has written to me passed his first year in captivity, Father Marty Jenco of Illinois. With Father Jenco in that letter of November 8 that I have not been able to forget over the holidays, the signatures of three other Americans appeared. It does not mean that Peter Kilburn, who was taken as a kidnap victim back in May 1984 is not alive, we pray that he is. It does not mean that in spite of all of the torture and death stories that our fine diplomat in our Embassy in Beirut, Mr. William Buckley, who was taken in March 1984, it does not mean that he is not alive; but we know that four are alive. We have seen their pictures. They have written to me and to our colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. GEORGE O'BRIEN.

I would just like to mention that the man who is approaching a year in captivity, Terry Anderson of the Associated Press, will pass that horrible point, God forbid, on March 16. His father is desperately ill and in the hospital.

I appeal to his captors, who believe, they say, in the same God that we honor, to release Terry so he can get to his father's bedside. It can become very serious very quickly.

I have worked very closely with the two sons. David Jacobson is from my County of Orange in California. David Jacobson, I will remind you, was taken May 28 of last year. His fellow worker at our great university in Beirut, Tom Sutherland, was taken prisoner within an hour of arriving at Beirut Airport on June 9 of last year.

I know that there are many religious emissaries going over, including the courageous Terry Waite, in the name of the archbishop of Canterbury in London. I hope that we will see a resolution to this problem soon.

I know the captors read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Be advised that no one in this or any other body will forget members of our American family.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Resolution 357, the rule on H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HUBBARD). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

INDIANA DUNES NATIONAL LAKESHORE 20TH ANNIVERSARY BOUNDARY EXTENSION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VISCLOSKY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. VISCLOSKY. Mr. Speaker, about 10,000 years ago, as the waters of ancient Lake Chicago began to recede following the glaciers of the Wisconsin period, a splendid and primitive wilderness began to form. During the next 9,000 years, dune ridges extending northward to the present shore of Lake Michigan were formed, thus creating the dunes country so eloquently described by Kay Franklin and the late Norma Schaeffer:

> The Dunes country, nestled between these ancient and new shorelines, offered a unique, various, and everchanging spectacle to the receptive eye. No single aspect lacked the characteristic, startling beauty of the whole: fine white beaches deposited for eons by angry lake storms, low dunes held stable by marram grass and sand cherry, woods composed of both northern and southern pine, ancient climax forests of beech and maple, and, no less breathtaking, the bogs, ponds, and swamps between the shoreline ridges. The Dunes exhibited a collage of contrasts, delicate and lush, stationary and moving, living, changing, dying, and living again.

In the summer of 1821, 165 years ago, Gen. John Tipton saw the dunes country differently.

It is my opinion,

> the hills are formed by the sand beating out of the Lake by the waves when it becomes dry. The hard wind which prevails here from the north drives it into those heaps. Immediately behind those hills the country falls off into ponds and marshes that never can admit of settlement nor never will be of much service to our state.

Tipton was wrong, but another 145 years were to pass until the Nation formally recognized the value of the Dunes by establishing the Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore.

Since it was first proposed in 1916 as the "Sand Dunes National Park" by Stephen Mather, the first director of the National Park Service, the concept of a dunes park, its purpose, and its identity have continued to change. As the dunes are everchanging, so too are the physical, natural, and social situations in which they exist and which they affect.

Therefore, as we celebrate the 20th anniversary of the lakeshore's official formation, I propose that legislative change again occur. Change is needed to ensure that the resource, which thousands have worked tirelessly to preserve, will be made fully accessible to all citizens in an environmentally sound manner. Change is needed to enhance the Park Service's ability to manage and control the lakeshore's perimeter and set aside certain additional areas of value. And finally, I propose to study the possible creation of a Dunes Parkway which would not only improve the national lakeshore from a Federal perspective, but would complement our local endeavors under the Marquette project to emerge from the shadows of industrial decline, by accentuating the positive as we travel the path of progress in northwest Indiana.

Today, I have introduced H.R. 4037, a bill which would incorporate these proposals.

The Dunes, their use and their preservation are exceptionally important to me. And while it may be of little note here, I will always take great personal pleasure in recalling that the first bill I introduced in this House pertained to the Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore.

I recommend this legislation to your attention and respectfully request your careful consideration of it as it now goes to committee.

VOTING "YES" ON EXPEDITED FUNDS AVAILABILITY ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GALLO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, because of personal circumstances I was unable to attend the voting on H.R. 2443, Expedited Funds Availability Act, and its amendments. Had I been present I would have voted "no" on all amendments and "Yes" on final passage.

POLAND INCORRECTLY IDENTIFIED BY GAO AS NAZI ALLY

tleman from New Jersey [Mr. RODINO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, on June 28, 1985 the Comptroller General issued a report entitled, "Nazis and Axis Collaborators Were Used to Further U.S. Anti-Communist Objectives in Europe—Some Immigrated to the United States" in response to a request I made in May 1982.

In chapter 1, in the introduction, the GAO stated inter alia, "These collaborators come from countries which allied themselves with Nazi Germany, or Fascist Italy, many of which are now under Communist rule; that is, Latvia, Estonia, Romania, Poland, and Hungary."

Many remember the heroic resistance of the Polish people in defending Warsaw against the Nazi blitzkrieg, the battles in which Polish cavalry fought Nazi Tiger tanks on horseback, the exploits of the Polish Air Force in England and above all, the glorious victory led by Polish troops at Monte Cassino in Italy. These actions, plus the continuous functioning of the Free Polish Government in London certainly remove the label of ally to Nazi Germany from any historical truth.

The Comptroller General acknowledges the error in his reference in the report and has sent me the following letter:

GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE,
Washington, DC, January 14, 1986.

Hon. PETER W. RODINO, Jr.,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: On page one, line 12 of our report to you entitled "Nazis and Axis Collaborators Were Used to Further U.S. Anti-Communist Objectives in Europe—Some Immigrated to the United States" GAO/GGD-85-66, June 28, 1985, we inadvertently included Poland in our listing of countries allied with Nazi Germany or Fascist Italy. We trust this letter will assist your Committee in responding to those who have brought this matter to your attention. The appropriate change has been made to our reserve stock of this report. We regret any inconvenience this matter may have caused.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM J. ANDERSON,
Director.

I sincerely hope that this public acknowledgement will atone for any offense felt by our citizens and immigrants of Polish ancestry.

CURRENT LEVEL OF SPENDING AND REVENUES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1986

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DERRICK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Chairman WILLIAM H. GRAY III, pursuant to the procedures of the Committee on the Budget and section 311(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, I am submitting the official letter to the Speaker advising him of the current level of spending and revenues for fiscal year 1986. Since my last report, Congress has cleared and the President has signed, the NASA authorization of 1986 (Public Law 99-170), the Labor-HHS appropriations, 1986 (Public Law 99-178), the Commerce, State, Justice appropriations, 1986 (Public Law 99-180), the further temporary extension (Public Law 99-181, Public Law 99-189, and Public Law 99-201), the Veterans Compensation Amendments of 1985 (Public Law 99-238), the Food Security Act of 1985 (Public Law 99-198), the Compact of Free Association (Public Law 99-239), and the further continuing appropriations for 1986 (Public Law 99-190). The President has vetoed the Textile and Apparel Trade Enforcement Act (H.R. 1562) and the Federal Employees Benefits Improvement Act (H.R. 3384). These actions result in changes to buget authority, outlay, and revenue estimates.

The current level is used to compare enacted spending after the start of a fiscal year with the aggregate ceiling on budget authority, outlays, and revenues established in a second budget resolution and enforced by point of order pursuant to section 311(a) of the act. The term current level refers to the estimated amount of budget authority, outlays, entitlement authority, and revenues that are available—or will be used—for the full fiscal year in question based only on enacted law.

The procedural situation with regard to the spending ceiling is affected by section 311(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended by Public Law 99-177. Enforcement against possible breaches of the spending ceiling under section 311(a) of the Budget Act will not apply where a measure would not cause a committee to exceed it's "appropriate allocation" made pursuant to section 302(a) of the Budget Act. In the House, the appropriate 302(a) allocation includes "new discretionary budget authority" and "new entitlement authority" only. It should be noted that under this procedure neither the total level of outlays nor a committee's outlay allocation is considered.

The intent of the section 302(a) "discretionary budget authority" and "new entitlement authority" subceiling provided by section 311(b) of the Budget Act, as amended, is to protect a committee that has stayed within it's own spending allocation—discretionary budget authority and new entitlement authority—from points of order if the total spending ceiling has been breached for reasons outside of its control. The 302(a) allocations to House committees made pursuant to the conference report on Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 were printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, September 5, 1985, 22975.

As chairman of the Budget Process Task Force, and on behalf of Chairman GRAY, I intend to keep the House informed regularly on the status of current level.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, DC, January 23, 1986.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL,
Speaker, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On January 30, 1976, the Committee on the Budget outlined the procedure which it has adopted in connection with its responsibilities under Section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to provide estimates of the current level of revenues and spending.

Pursuant to Committee Rule 10, I am herewith transmitting the status report under S. Con. Res. 32, the First Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for Fiscal Year 1986. This report reflects the adopted budget resolution of August 1, 1985, and the current CBO estimates of budget authority, outlays, and revenues.

The procedural situation with regard to the spending ceiling is affected by Section 311(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended by P.L. 99-177. Enforcement against possible breaches of the spending ceiling under Section 311(a) of the Budget Act will not apply where a measure would not cause a committee to exceed its "appropriate allocation" made pursuant to Section 302(a) of the Budget Act. In the House, the appropriate 302(a) allocation includes "new discretionary budget authority" and "new entitlement authority" only. It should be noted that under this procedure neither the total level of outlays nor a committee's outlay allocation is considered.

The intent of the Section 302(a) "discretionary budget authority" and "new entitlement authority" subceiling provided by Section 311(b) of the Budget Act, as amended, is to protect a committee that has stayed within its spending allocation—discretionary budget authority and new entitlement authority—from points of order if the total spending ceiling has been breached for reasons outside of its control. The 302(a) allocations to House committees made pursuant to the conference report on S. Con. Res. 32 were printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, September 5, 1985, H. 7290.

The enclosed tables compare enacted legislation to each committee's 302(a) allocation of discretionary budget authority and of new entitlement authority.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM H. GRAY III,
Chairman.

CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to section 308(b) and in aid of section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act, as amended, this letter and supporting detail provide an up-to-date tabulation of the current levels of new budget authority, estimated outlays and estimated revenues in comparison with the appropriate levels for those items contained in the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the 1986 budget (S. Con. Res. 32). This report for fiscal year 1986 is tabulated as of close of business January 21, 1986 and is based on assumptions and estimates consistent with S. Con. Res. 32. A summary of this tabulation is as follows:

WAIVER FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA REVENUE BONDS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from the District of Columbia [Mr. FAUNTROY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, on the last day of the 1st session of the 99th Congress, December 19, 1985, both the House and Senate passed H.R. 3718 waiving the 30-day congressional layover period for four acts of the council of the District of Columbia.

Unfortunately, by clerical error, the last page of H.R. 3718, listing two of the council acts, was dropped in preparing the enrolled bill for the President's signature. Part of H.R. 3718 became law—Public Law 99-216—and part was left out.

I and my colleagues Chairman DELLUMS, Mr. MCKINNEY, the ranking minority member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and Congressman BARNES and BLILEY have joined in introducing H.R. 4027 to add the two council acts to the list with waivers as was intended by Congress.

The text of H.R. 4027 and an explanation follow:

A bill extending the waiver authority of the District of Columbia Revenue Bond Act of 1985 to certain revenue bond acts of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. GRANTING OF WAIVER.

Section 2(c) of the District of Columbia Revenue Bond Act of 1985 (P.L. 99-216) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(3) The American University Revenue Bond Act of 1985 (Series A), District of Columbia act 6-111, transmitted to the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate December 4, 1985.

"(4) The George Washington University Revenue Bond Act of 1985 (Series A), District of Columbia act 6-114, transmitted to the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate December 18, 1985."

SEC. 2. EFFECTIVE DATE OF ACTS; TREATMENT OF OBLIGATIONS.

(a) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The District of Columbia acts referred to in the amendment made by secton 1 shall take effect as if included in section 2(c) of the district of Columbia revenue Bond Act of 1985 on the date of the enactment of such Act.

(b) TREATMENT OF OBLIGATIONS.—(1) Subject to paragraph (2), for purposes of any act of Congress (and any amendments made by any Act of congress) enacted after December 31, 1985, any obligation issued under the authority of the District of Columbia acts made effective under subsection (a) shall be deemed to have been issued on December 31, 1985.

(2) Paragraph (1) shall apply only to obligations issued not more than 60 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

H.R. 4027—AMENDMENT TO D.C. REVENUE BOND ACT OF 1985

The House on Monday, January 27, is scheduled to consider a unanimous consent request to consider a bill to waive the period of Congressional review of two acts of the D.C. Council, authorizing the issuance of revenue bonds, and to make them effective December 26, 1985.

ACTION BY THE 99TH CONGRESS

H.R. 4027 was introduced on January 22, 1986 and referred by the Speaker to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

BILL SUMMARY

H.R. 4027 waives the normal 30 day Congressional layover period for two Council acts approving revenue bonds for construction at American University and George Washington University and makes them effective December 26, 1985.

BACKGROUND

The waivers in H.R. 4027 had already passed both the House and Senate on December 19, 1985 as part of H.R. 3718, but a clerical error left them out of H.R. 3718 as it was printed on parchment for signatures of the Speaker of the House, President of the Senate, and President of the United States. Thus H.R. 3718, as it became P.L. 99-216, gives waivers for bonds for Georgetown University and Sibley Hospital but not for the two universities listed on the last page of H.R. 3718 as it passed the House and Senate.

The urgency of getting municipal revenue bonds adopted by December 31, 1985 arises because H.R. 3838, the Tax Reform Act of 1985, reported by the Ways Means Committee, passed the House on December 17, 1985, and is being considered by the Senate. It changes the tax treatment of municipal revenue bonds effective January 1, 1986.

States and cities throughout the country hastened to approve revenue bond issues by December 31, 1985, to take advantage of the more favorable tax treatment in existing federal law. The District of Columbia was at a disadvantage in comparison with other local and state governments because federal law (the D.C. Home Rule Act) postpones the effective date of acts adopted by the Council of the District of Columbia for 30 legislative days of Congress, during which time Congress could veto the local legislation. The Council acts were adopted by the District and transmitted to Congress in December 1985.

H.R. 4027 waives the 30 day period and allows the local laws to take effect in December 1985 with the other bond issues in P.L. 99-216.

Cost: CBO estimated no cost to the federal government in its opinions on H.R. 3718, which contained waivers on these and other D.C. revenue bonds.

MAYOR'S REPORT ON HUNGER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I had the honor to meet with the Task Force on Hunger and Homelessness of the U.S. Conference of Mayors. At the meeting, Mayor Raymond Flynn of Boston, Task Force Chairman, released a new study entitled "The Growth of Hunger, Homelessness and Poverty in America's Cities in 1985." I regret to report that the plight of the hungry and the homeless continues to worsen in our Nation's cities.

The new report by the U.S. Conference of Mayors is based upon a survey of the 25 cities whose mayors serve on the Task Force on Hunger and Homelessness. Among the key findings in the survey were:

(1) During 1985, 24 of the 25 cities experienced an increase in demand for emergency food assistance. The average increase in demand was 28 percent, including a significant growth in the number of families with children seeking aid.

(2) In 90 percent of the cities surveyed, the demand for emergency shelter increased by an average of 25 percent in 1985. In over half of the cities, shelters routinely turn away people in need.

(3) Despite improvements in the official unemployment rate in nearly half of the cities, most cities reported growth in the number of residents in poverty during 1985. An overwhelming majority of cities expect increases in demand for emergency food and shelter assistance in 1986.

Mr. Speaker, these finding are consistent with the testimony received in 1985 by the Subcommittee on Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations, and Nutrition, which I chair. Both this subcommittee and the Select Committee on Hunger have documented a significant growth in domestic hunger over the past few years. Despite improvements in the overall economy, the American hunger problem continues to grow more severe.

I was gratified that H.R. 2100, the recently enacted Food Security Act of 1985 (Public Law 99-198), included several provisions that will make a small dent in our hunger problem. However, much work remains to be done. Particularly, in this year of large anticipated budget cutbacks, we must not sweep aside our concern for America's most vulnerable citizens. Through my work as subcommittee chairman as well as chairman of the Task Force on Domestic Hunger of the Select Committee on Hunger, I intend to continue to focus congressional attention on issues like hunger and homelessness.

A summary of the new U.S. Conference of Mayors as well as several tables from the report, follow:

SUMMARY

To assess the current status of hunger, homelessness and poverty in cities, the U.S. Conference of Mayors surveyed the 25 cities whose mayors are members of its Task Force on Hunger and Homelessness. The survey questioned 1) the demand for emergency food assistance and the local response to it; 2) the extent and demographics of the local homeless population and the availability of shelter and other services for homeless people; 3) the persistance of the hunger and homelessness problems and the impact of the economic recovery on them; 4) economic conditions relating to poverty and unemployment; and 5) the outlook for these problems in 1986.

HUNGER

In every Task Force city save one the overall demand for emergency food assistance increased during 1985, on average by 28 percent. In all but two cities, or 92 percent of the Task Force cities, the number of families with children requesting emergency food assistance increased during 1985, by an average of 30 percent.

An average of 17 percent of the demand for emergency food assistance currently goes unmet in the responding cities. Emergency food assistance facilities have to turn people away in two out of three of the responding cities.

Twenty-two of the Task Force cities, or 88 percent of those surveyed, expect the demand for emergency food assistance to increase during 1986; the remainder expect it to remain the same.

Low benefits in public assistance programs, poverty and employment problems lead the list of reasons for the persistence of hunger. Every city save one reported that the national economic recovery has not eased the local hunger problem.

Every survey city except one reported that city government funds—either locally generated revenues or federal or state grants—are used to support local emergency food assistance efforts. In 71 percent of these cities, locally generated revenues are used for this purpose.

HOMELESSNESS

The demand for emergency shelter increased in nearly nine out of 10 of the survey cities during 1985; the average increase was 25 percent. The demand did not decrease in any of the cities.

In 60 percent of the cities, emergency shelters cannot accommodate all of the people seeking assistance. In over half of those cities, shelters must routinely turn away people in need.

Homelessness is expected to continue to increase in 22 of the cities during 1986. Homelessness is not expected to decrease in any of the survey cities this year.

Identified most often as reasons for the persistence of homelessness in cities were: the shortage of housing affordable by low income persons, changes in mental health policies combined with a lack of community services for chronically mentally ill individuals, and unemployment problems. In none of the 25 Task Force cities has the national economic recovery lessened the problem of homelessness.

On average, the composition of the cities' homeless population is 60 percent single men, 28 percent families and 12 percent single women. The number of families with children and the number of single young adults who are homeless have grown significantly in recent years. More persons with chronic mental illness are now found in the homeless population.

Eighty-eight percent of the responding cities use city government funds—either locally generated revenues or federal or state grants—to support shelters and other services for the homeless. Funding sources more frequently used include the Community Services Block Grant, General Revenue Sharing and the Federal Emergency Food and Shelter Program.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Officials in more than half of the Task Force cities indicated that the number of poor residents increased during 1985. Two cities reported decreases in the number of poor people; seven said the number remained the same.

All but three of the responding cities indicated that the problems of the "new poor" have continued. Five cities specifically suggest that their numbers have increased.

The unemployment problem decreased in 46 percent of the responding cities, stayed the same in 29 percent, and increased in one-fourth of them during 1985. City officials expect that in 1986 unemployment will stay the same in 57 percent of the responding cities, increase in 30 percent and decrease in 13 percent.

All but three of the Task Force cities reported that the "official" unemployment rate does not accurately reflect the actual unemployment problem for their city. The reasons most often cited were the failure to include discouraged workers or the underemployed.

LEGISLATION THAT PROHIBITS THE PURCHASE OF SOVIET ENRICHMENT SERVICES FOR UNITED STATES NUCLEAR POWERPLANTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Tennessee [Mrs. LLOYD] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill which prohibits nuclear electric power utilities in the United States from purchasing uranium enrichment services from the Soviet Union.

The United States operates a Uranium Enrichment Program through the Department of Energy, and it is intended to be fully self-sufficient through the revenues it generates from the customers it serves. In the recent past, the demand for uranium enrichment services has been substantially reduced causing a significant retrenchment in the Government's program and the closure of one of the Government's three uranium enrichment plants in the United States.

Soviet Union sales of enrichment services to domestic utilities impair the ability of the United States to continue its Uranium Enrichment Program, which the United States operates without a profit for the benefit of electric ratepayers.

The Soviet Union does not operate its uranium enrichment business on the principles of a free market society. They offer their enrichment services at a discount from whatever level is established as the price of enrichment services in the United States.

The Soviet Union is an unfair competitor and enrichment service sales to U.S. citizens detract from the national energy security of the United States.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues to commemorate the 68th anniversary of the Declaration of Independence made by the Ukrainian Central Rada, the Parliament of the Ukrainian people. The short-lived period of freedom begun on January 22, 1918, is one that must not be forgotten by freedom-loving people throughout the world. Although these remarks come a day after the official Independence day, let me reaffirm my continued support for the Ukrainian people in their long fight to regain that precious freedom.

The people of the Ukraine have long suffered as a captive nation under the control of the Soviet Union. Many of their most patriotic citizens have been imprisoned for urging a free Ukraine.

Events and conditions in "Iron Curtain" nations are rarely reported in the free world. The current struggle for freedom against the Soviet invaders in Afghanistan receives very little exposure in the West. This suppression of information unfavorable to the Soviets has been a strict policy of the Soviet regime. An earlier, devastating example is the Ukrainian famine of 1932–33. This outrageous program brought on as a result of the relocation of Ukrainian citizens and the confiscation of their grain, claimed some 7 million Ukrainian lives, a figure greater than that of the Nazi Holocaust. Yet the Soviets categorically deny there ever was such a famine.

We must not forget this inhumane action. It is our resonsibility to know and pursue the truth about this event. In the last Congress I supported the establishment of a Commission on the Ukrainian Famine to study the causes and events of this tragic famine.

Now I have joined two of my colleagues in introducing House Joint Resolution 494, to authorize the establishment of a memorial to honor Prince Volodymyr the Great of the Ukraine. As head of the Ukraine in the 10th century, Prince Volodymyr was instrumental in unifying the lands and people of the Ukraine, in introducing Christianity to the region, and in working for the freedom of the Ukrainian people. I hope the House will act quickly to approve this legislation.

Once again, I want to commemorate the brief period of freedom for the Ukraine and to reaffirm my dedication to the fight for freedom and independence for all oppressed people.

CONGRESS HAS WALKED AWAY FROM DEFICIT PROBLEM WITH GRAMM-RUDMAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, this week Congress reconvened for the 2d session of the 99th Congress. Some commentators have questioned why we bothered coming back, in light of our passage of the Gramm-Rudman measure last year—and frankly, I am inclined to wonder myself.

Last year, over my objections and the opposition of far too few of my colleagues, Congress simply walked away from the budget deficit problem and turned its back on the Constitution.

In adopting Gramm-Rudman, Congress conceded the battle of the budget to the President, and admitted that it lacked the ability—or perhaps the will—to control Federal revenues and expenditures on its own. In that act, Congress gave up a good portion of its most fundamental constitutional power—the power of the purse. It is most basically the power to raise revenues and provide for the expenditure of Federal funds that the Constitution gives to the Congress alone. In adopting Gramm-Rudman, Congress said "no, thanks. We aren't prepared to make those decisions. We would rather let unelected bureaucrats, bean counters, and computers make those choices."

Mr. Speaker, I don't think the Constitution lets us walk away from those decisions and I don't think that our constituents should either. The people of this country have elected us to make the hard decisions on Federal policy and spending. I am not prepared to surrender my vote, and my representation of the people of western Massachusetts, to some bureaucrat's red pen.

This week, the General Accounting Office has reported to the President on the percentage cuts that will need to be made in order to meet the fiscal year 1986 budget deficit targets set in the Gramm-Rudman measure. It is anticipated that those cuts, amounting to a 4.3-percent reduction in certain nondefense programs, and a 4.9-percent reduction in certain defense programs, will be included in a Presidential order on February 1, and in the absence of intervening congressional action will take effect on March 1.

The possibility of congressional action, either to make sufficient budget cuts to avoid the operation of the Gramm-Rudman process, or to overturn the process itself, is obviously not anticipated, in light of the scheduled recess from February 8 to 18. So what do we have in store for the Nation under Gramm-Rudman this year?

We start off with the inevitable consequence of our failure to make tough choices. Instead of using our judgment about what programs should be cut, and how much, we have taken an ax to the process, undoing in the time it takes to do a computer run the priorities set in nearly 11 months of last year's budget and appropriations process.

Let's start with some of the more bizarre consequences of Gramm-Rudman, the ones that would qualify for Ripley's Believe-It-or-Not. One example is the Panama Canal Commission, that provides for the operation of the Panama Canal through the tolls it collects. Under Gramm-Rudman, expenditures for canal operations and capital improvements are reduced by 4.3 percent, but the tolls keep coming in. The difference, instead of going to the Federal Treasury, goes to the Government of Panama. Does this make sense? Of course not.

How about another curiosity? The 4.3-percent cut would slice about $2 million in interest payments on federally guaranteed bonds for the Washington, DC, subway system, thereby triggering a default for which the Federal Government would be liable.

The cost of honoring the guarantee on the $997 million worth of bonds will be far greater than the ostensible $2 million savings. Does this make sense? Of course not. Fortunately, GAO recognized that this would be absurd and ruled that the bond payments should be exempt from cuts in its report to the President.

Does it make sense to cut funding for our revenue collecting agencies like the IRS and the Customs Service? Under Gramm-Rudman, the IRS gets a $156 million cut, wiping out much of the $250 million in supplemental funding that was going to be requested to overcome last year's tax return processing difficulties.

Does it make sense to cut an agency whose enforcement efforts return between $9 and $10 for every dollar expended? Of course not.

Over the weekend, FAA police at National and Dulles Airports went on alert following a bomb threat and reports that Libyan terrorists might attempt to sabotage a flight from Canada. In light of the increased dangers and threats of terrorism, does it make sense to cut back on FAA police and sky marshals? For that matter, at a time when aviation safety is a major concern, does it make sense to cut back on FAA safety inspectors and air traffic controllers? Of course not.

Mr. Speaker, one of the primary sources of savings is supposed to be the elimination of fraud, waste, and abuse in Federal contracting.

Just this week, we received a report that the Air Force paid as much as $317.79 for 67 toilet pans on its C-5A cargo planes. At a time when incidents like this are almost routine, does it make sense to cut back on funding for inspector general offices?

Do we really want to cut back on bid rigging investigations at EPA and the Federal Highway Administration? Of course not.

After a year of debate and consideration, we passed a funding bill that was signed by the President for the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education. After the careful consideration of the priorities contained in that measure, do we really want to cut back on funds for education, for low income energy assistance, for maternal and child health, for childhood vaccinations, for job training, and for biomedical research? I doubt it.

Mr. Speaker, year after year, I have been proud to go back to my district, meet with my senior citizens, and tell them of the effort which the Congress has made to assure decent, safe and affordable housing. This year, I am not proud to tell them that although we were able to exempt large corporations with Synthetic Fuels Corporation loan guarantees from Gramm-Rudman cuts, we were not able to exempt a mere 12,000 units of elderly and handicapped housing.

No, I am not proud to tell this growing constituency that, although our advances in medicine will allow them to live longer and healthier lives, there may be nowhere for them to live.

I can only tell them that the Congress, in its wisdom, has allowed a computer to reduce our minimal Federal commitment of $631 million in direct construction loans by another $27.1 million. At least 500 older Americans have lost the Federal commitment of safe and decent subsidized housing in fiscal year 1986.

And, for those seniors receiving food donations through USDA's elderly feeding program, I will have to report further bad news: They can expect to see a cut of about $6 million from levels approved by the Congress and the President just 1 month ago. About 9 million less meals will be served in senior centers and to the homebound elderly in fiscal year 1986. Deficit reductions in this case mean nutrition reductions. And savings do indeed mean losses.

For single, unemployed mothers attempting to become self-sufficient, and for large, low-income families on waiting lists for public housing, I have no better news to report. Of the $10 billion made available for assisted housing in November of 1985, the President must sequester another $422 million. What does this action save? A total of $408,000 in outlays—that's right—only $408,000 in outlays this fiscal year.

What do we tell thousands of proud, hardworking Americans in towns and cities across the United States who have been struggling to find new employment because of plant closings? Who is going to meet the gap in economic, community, and urban development funds necessary for the revitalization of their hometowns? When my constituents in North Adams, thousands of whom have lost their jobs over the past few years, ask me how Gramm-Rudman is helping them, their children and grandchildren, I will have to give them the straight facts.

I'll have to tell them that at the crucial time, when Congress was being called upon for leadership, it surrendered the field.

Mr. Speaker, in our actions of the past year, we made choices and set priorities. And now we are surrendering those choices to a computer—a decision I might better have anticipated in George Orwell's "1984" than in the United States in 1985.

Mr. Speaker, because of my concerns over the constitutionality of Gramm-Rudman, I have joined 11 of my colleagues in challenging this measure. I hope that the three-judge court will soon invalidate Gramm-Rudman, and that the Supreme Court will uphold that decision.

In the meantime, I hope that my colleagues—and the administration—will recognize that Gramm-Rudman is a perverse form of legislative "chicken." We need to correct the problems inherent in a percentage reduction system.

We need to get serious and raise the necessary revenues to support the programs that we—and our constituents—consider important. We need to deal with a process that would exempt the $400 million Clean Coal Technology Program from cuts because it is funded by transfer, rather than by appropriations, while imposing cuts on critically needed human service and resource programs.

Mr. Speaker, Gramm-Rudman was a mistake. I hope that we will recognize that there is nothing inherently magical about eliminating the deficit by 1991.

POLITICS AS USUAL VERSUS A NEW GENERATION OF IDEAS AND LEADERSHIP

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, politics as usual versus a new generation of ideas and leadership is the topic of my special order this evening, because I think that is the key question of this session of Congress. That will be the key question of the election this fall, that will be the key question of the 1988 Presidential election. Are we going to have politics as usual or is a new generation of ideas, a new generation of solutions and a new generation of leadership going to emerge?

As some candidates discovered in 1984, simply talking about new ideas as a code-term is not enough. You have to actually have new ideas, new proposals, new legislation.

The key question I think that the American people are asking as they look at this Congress is are we going to continue to drift and decay or are we going to get America into shape for our children and our grandchildren, because the challenge is clear. We have used up the great advantage of winning World War II and creating great industrial and technological advantages over our competitors. Two generations of the liberal welfare state have raised taxes, multiplied the bureaucracy, created massive redtape, built ghettos of welfare, created a bureaucracy which has crippled our productive capacity, distorted our priorities and produced an overly centralized society.

It is hard to realize, but as late as 1965, the United States was clearly the dominant economic power on the planet. We had stability, we were developing a growing economy, we were on the way to landing men on the Moon, we were leading the planet. And then for 15 long years, we decayed. We decayed through the Great Society, we decayed through a war we would not pay for, we decayed as the liberal ideas of the liberal welfare state took root. We watched families disintegrate, we watched neighborhoods collapse, we watched schools educate less and less. We had more and more redtape, more power in Washington, less power at home, and more stiffling uniformity across the Government. We had a bureaucracy that as it grew larger grew less efficient, as it grew more numerous, grew less competent.

By 1980, the America which had helped defeat Hitler's Germany and Japan, and the America which had created a productive capacity so great that in 1945 one-half of all of the economic activity in the world was in the United States, by 1980, that America had massive inflation, 13 percent a year, had a prime interest rate of 22 percent, the highest we had ever had in peacetime, had growing unemployment, was losing its ability to compete with Japan or Korea or Germany, and was weakened militarily, ridiculed around the planet, and was in grave danger of disintegrating.

In 1980, Ronald Reagan was elected President. America stood at the crossroads and began to move toward an opportunity society and away from the liberal welfare state. In 1980, the American people said no to inflation, no to the decay of our jobs and to rising unemployment, no to higher interest rates.

For 5 years, we have had a Reagan administration presiding over a liberal welfare state Government. For every Reagan appointee, there have been 1,000 career civil servants. For every pro-Reagan newspaperman or woman, television reporter in this city, there have been 100 who grew up in the liberal welfare state and still believe in it. For every Reagan intellectual, there have been five liberal welfare state academics. For every Reagan interest group, there have been 5, 10, 15 liberal welfare state interest groups.

The result has been that for 5 long years, the President has preached a vision of an opportunity society, but the Congress refused to follow and the city of Washington refused to follow. The cry has been again and again, raise taxes, raise taxes, keep the bureaucracy strong, and in Washington, make sure the welfare state survives.

Today America is again at a crossroads. Thanks to the brilliance of PHIL GRAMM, and the hard work of GRAMM, RUDMAN, MACK, in developing a process which is crude, which is clumsy, but which I believe, and I will discuss in a minute, is necessary, today we have the possibility of focusing for the first time on bringing the liberal welfare state under control.

We also find that the clock is ticking, that we only have 3 more years of Ronald Reagan as President. If we do not get the job underway and make the decisive changes in 1986, 1987, and 1988, after 1988, the future is unknown. For the first time in many years, we will have an election in which both parties nominate new people, and in which we literally face the greatest choices we will have faced since 1960. Not since 1960 has there been an election in which no incumbent is running for reelection.

In 1964, Lyndon Johnson was President and he ran for reelection. In 1968, Hubert Humphrey was a Vice President, already in office. Richard Nixon had been Vice President. In 1972, Richard Nixon ran for reelection. In 1976, Gerald Ford ran for reelection. In 1980, Jimmy Carter ran for reelection. In 1984, Ronald Reagan ran for reelection. Again and again, there was some sense of stability.

In 1988, in all probability, there will be a wide-open election, a wide-open set of choices. And as the American people look to 1988, I think they would feel much more secure, much safer, much calmer if they could start by knowing that under President Reagan's leadership, the Congress had gotten its act together, it had heeded the will of the people, it as working to truly solve the problems of the liberal welfare state, of massive deficit spending, of the huge debt we are building up for our grandchildren.

So today America is at a crossroads. If we maintain the liberal welfare state, raise taxes, and borrow more money, the simple fact is we will not be able to compete with Japan, Korea, and West Germany economically. We will not be able to protect ourselves from the Soviet Union militarily or lead the Third World into productivity, free elections, and the rule of law.

America is the keystone of Western civilization, of the value of justice under law, of decent standards of living for everyone, of the free press, of free elections, of physical safety from attack by governments or by terrorists. A weak America undermines our way of life and threatens the very survival of our civilization. Without a strong, prosperous America, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization will not last. Without a strong, prosperous America, the continuing shift of the Pacific RIM countries to free enterprise and free governments will not continue, without a strong, prosperous America, there will be no world trade, there will be no dynamic Third World countries earning money, growing in prosperity so that they can repay their loans to the banks. Without a strong, prosperous America, there will be no vision of free people working together freely to create through a free enterprise system new ideas, new technology, and a new standard of living and new hope for their children and their grandchildren.

Therefore, the crossroads we are at have to be answered first in terms of a strong prosperous America. How can we ensure that the economy keeps growing? How can we ensure that we keep creating new jobs, new opportunities? How can we ensure that more inventors, more entrepreneurs go out every day and create more for the future of our children and our grandchildren?

It is time for our generation to grow up. The babyboomers and their children have been adolescents politically long enough. It is time to talk about the truth, to look the truth square in the eye and to make the big decisions. It is time for us to set policy, not just for a week or a month, not even for a year or a decade, but for a generation, to decide that we are tired of being incapable of building enough new factories, building enough new equipment, investing enough savings to compete with the Japanese economically. We are tired of a welfare state that explains to us that we cannot stop the cocaine trade, we cannot educate our children adequately. We cannot provide hope and opportunity in the ghetto, we cannot recreate the bonds of traditional strength that are the very key to families for minority Americans.

We have to start, I think, by looking at the question of budget deficits and by asking ourselves what are we going to do in a country which has in recent years had a remarkably bad record. The simple fact is that if Congress refuses to implement the Balanced Budget Act of 1985, in 1990, just 4 years from now, interest payments on the deficit will consume more than 40 percent, actually 41 percent, of individual income tax collection for 1990 alone.

In other words, we are like a family going into debt which borrows more and more money. I find when I go back home and talk about this that there are enough people now who use credit cards that understand the idea that if you spend a lot in December, and you keep giving people that plastic card, that at the end of the month, you are going to have some very big bills come in. If you do not pay those bills off the next month, there is going to be interest charged on those bills, and that if month after month you keep doing that, you keep buying more than you pay off, the interest is going to get bigger and bigger and bigger, and when the interest gets big enough, you are in real trouble.

Let us look at it in two different ways. First of all, out of the income tax the American people will pay, if the Balanced Budget Act of 1985 is not implemented, then in 1990, just to pay the interest, and this does not pay a dime of the debt, just to pay the interest will take 41 percent of our income tax. In other words, out of every $1 we pay the Federal Government out of our income tax in 1990, 41 cents will go, not to pay off the debt, it will go to pay purely and simply for the interest. Already today, 15 percent of the Federal budget is devoted to interest.

Of all of the entire, gigantic Federal budget, interest is the No. 3 item after Social Security and defense. And in fact, interest takes up more of our tax money today than the Army and the Marine Corps combined. Think about it.

People complain about defense, and I think there is waste in defense. I think we do need to overhaul the defense system. I helped to cofound the military reform caucus precisely because we need a more aggressive approach to rethinking the Pentagon.

But as expensive as it is to have an entire Army and an entire Marine Corps, those two combined are cheaper than paying just the interest on the debt. And every liberal in America should consider the fact that paying interest on the debt is one of the most regressive things you can do, because you take the money from working Americans and you give it to people who are wealthy enough to be holding Government bonds. There is a transfer of money from those who work for a living to those who have saved up and live on their bonds.

So that 15 percent of the budget that goes directly from working Americans to those who have saved is not something that the liberals should be proud of or feel good about.

How have we gotten this debt? Since 1960, there have been 24 deficits in 25 years. Today the Federal Government owes more than $2 trillion.

Let me put that in perspective. In 1962, just 24 years ago, the U.S. Government owed $300 billion. By 1980, that had grown to $1 trillion. That is with a "t" now—not $1 million, not $1 billion—$1 trillion dollars. By 1986, it had grown to $2 trillion. Today we owe over $2 trillion.

Why? Because, from 1962 to 1978, total Government expenses grew 800 percent. Imagine that. In fact, the debt is now so massive, for 1986 alone, the projected debt is $220 billion. This year we will borrow almost as much money as the entire Federal debt in 1962.

It is almost ironic to go back and read the Nixon-Kennedy debates of 1960 when they worried about whether they were going to be $5 billion in debt, and to realize that today we run up a bigger debt than that every 10 days. So the debt is large and has been growing.

Furthermore, the problem has not been primarily taxes. Consider last year. In fiscal 1985, with all of the tax cuts, Federal revenues increased $67,500,000,000.

That is, last year, because we were creating jobs, because people were getting better jobs, because they were able to move up and get a salary increase, because people were coming off of unemployment, off of food stamps, going back to work, and paying taxes, last year we increased Federal revenues $67,500,000,000.

Good, you say? Wonderful? That means we are moving toward a balanced budget. After all, revenues increased.

Not at all. In fiscal year 1985 Federal spending increased by $94 billion, the largest 1-year increase in American history. Now the increase was $94 billion. I can remember in the 1960's Lyndon Johnson working desperately to keep spending, all spending, total spending, under $100 billion.

Last year the increase in Federal spending was almost as large as the entire Federal budget under Lyndon Johnson in 1964. That means that even though the amount of money the Government got in the form of taxes went up by $67,500,000,000, because spending went up $94 billion, the all-time record, we actually lost ground. Even though we got $67,500,000,000 more from the American people, we went $27 billion deeper into debt because Congress simply could not control its spending. Between fiscal years 1963 and 1985, in 22 years time, Federal spending climbed from $111 to $946 billion. That is an increase of almost 900 percent in those 22 years.

Does the deficit matter? Are budget deficits dangerous? Sometimes yes, sometimes no. The bias of the 18th and 19th centuries was clearly antideficit except in dire emergencies. In the 20th century, the bias of a liberal welfare state has been prodeficit. The contrast between free liberal welfare state America and modern liberal welfare state is startling. Dr. Alvin Rabushka, senior fellow at the Hoover Institution, points out in his book "From Adam Smith to the Wealth of America" that from 1795 to 1811 America cut its national debt from $84 million to $45 million. Following the War of 1812 America had 18 years of revenue surplus and nearly paid off all of the national debt of 1836. After the Civil War there were 28 surpluses in a row and the national debt dropped from $2.7 billion to $960 million.

Think of that. Twenty-eight straight years of a surplus. Earlier, 18 surpluses in 21 years. The 19th century commitment to hard money, limited government, and annual surpluses was replaced in the 1930's by the liberal welfare state vision of soft money, centralized bureaucracy, and Government borrowing. The liberal welfare state financed itself by steadily increasing deficits. Since 1960 there have been 24 deficits in 25 years. In 1962 the U.S. Government owed $300 billion. This year it owed seven times as much, over $2 trillion.

Interest on the debt is now the third largest single item in the Federal budget. These deficits indicate that the real key to the liberal welfare state was not a redistribution of income among classes as Karl Marx called for; the real focus of the liberal welfare state has been to redistribute income among generations. In the liberal welfare state version of generational redistribution, this year's politician gives money and services to this year's voter by pledging the resources of future voters. There are no incentives for current fiscal discipline because no one in the current generation will pay the future bills. In fact, liberal welfare state politicians have a credit card whose bills come due in a future generation, and yet the future generation is not able to vote on what to buy with that credit card.

The result of this kind of generational redistribution has been the radical growth in transfer payments. In 1952 the figure was $4,400 million. In 1978 the figure was $218,700 million. In other words, transfer payments grew dramatically. Rabushka notes during these years population grew 39 percent, personal comsumption grew 153 percent, but total Government expenses grew 800 percent.

While the contrast in spending philosophy is evident, it is not clear that the 18th-century or 19th-century focus on balanced budget was fairer and healthier than the 20th-century focus. To really know if deficits are bad, we need to know the circumstances that created them. Historically there have been only three sensible reasons to go into debt.

First, a nation at war may have to finance a war with deficits. Second, it may be good to have a budget deficit if there are high private sector savings rates. In this case it may, in fact, be wise to sell Government bonds to absorb the current private surplus as a form of investing in Government.

Alexander Hamilton's use of the national debt in the 1790's was based on this economic principle.

Finally, a nation could go into debt to fund a project that might benefit our children and our grandchildren, a program which borrowed from current income to create a more productive and prosperous future might make a great deal of sense.

The liberal welfare state fails on all three counts. America is at peace. We do not have massive private savings. Under the liberal welfare state, U.S. tax policy and Government programs discourage savings and encourage borrowing. The result is a private sector savings rate that is miniscule by historical standards, anemic compared to our level of world trade, and vastly insufficient to fund our national debt.

We are not using the debt as a tool to invest in the future of our country. Instead, the current liberal welfare state deficit is used to cover current services. Far from improving the future, the cost of the welfare state, including transfer payments, is crowding out infrastructure investment and technological progress that might improve our future. If anything, the liberal welfare state deficit is going to be a massive burden on future Americans and their ability to create new opportunities and new wealth. Now we are faced with the question of, How dangerous is it to run a deficit, year after year?

We know from history large deficits lead to large crises. When a nation consistently spends more than it earns, it eventually finds itself in deep economic difficulty. America is approaching just such a crisis. The rise of the global money market, the large flow of capital from Europe and Japan, and the influx of Third World upper-class money has allowed the United States to manage its deficits without a liquidity crisis of severe proportions. Americans have been consuming resources borrowed from our neighbors around the world. We have lived better than we have earned.

How serious a danger is the potential for a fiscal heart attack due to a liquidity crisis? In pre-1929 language, we would call it a "panic." What would happen if the Europeans and the Japanese came to fear that America was not able to pay its debts and stopped their investments? The result would be a classic liquidity crisis in which the Federal Reserve System would have to boost the value of the dollar by allowing interest rates to skyrocket. Or, it would have to increase the money supply to 1980 Carter administration inflation levels or worse. There does not seem to be a good alternative to foreign investment without drawing down the already low domestic savings accounts. In short, after 200 years, we have returned to the conditions of 1790 when the Dutch financial market kept the U.S. debt afloat.

This crisis is not inevitable. There does not have to be a financial crisis due to the debt if the American economy grows rapidly enough that foreign investors continue to feel the dollar is a strong investment. If investors conclude the American economy is strong enough to back its debt, they will probably continue to keep their investments flowing.

However, the morning foreign investors conclude that America is not capable of growing out from under its debt, there will surely be a run on the dollar and, in turn, a liquidity crisis. The key, then, to America's financial stability is to maintain a healthy economy so no one fears our ability to pay off our debt. It is important for our general economic growth that we move to five new principles that should govern a modern approach to the deficit.

First, implementing the Gramm-Rudman-Mack plan for cutting the deficit over the next 6 years.

Second, investing in the future rather than merely buying services for the present.

Third, solving the problems of redistributing the wealth of future generations to present voters.

Fourth, resisting the pressure to adopt protectionism as a solution to the trade deficit instead of a pro-growth, pro-export policy.

Fifth, resisting the temptation to raise taxes as a solution to the deficit problem.

First, Gramm-Rudman-Mack may be proof that, as one humorist put it, we wanted to balance the budget in the "worst possible way, and we succeeded." As unelegant and clumsy as Gramm-Rudman-Mack is, it is the only system of deficit reduction we have been able to pass. It is the best chance we have of balancing the budget before financial disaster shatters the U.S. economy.

Let me make it very clear, I think the Gramm-Rudman-Mack system is terrible. I think the Gramm-Rudman-Mack system takes power away from the President and the elected Congress and invests it, delegates it, to technocrats who should not have it. I think that ideally Congress ought to do its job. I think that ideally the President ought to do his job.

I think the fact is that we have collectively failed. We have failed for years. We have failed ever since 1960 in every year except one. So the question becomes: Are we capable of an elegant, complex, theoretically correct solution? In my judgment, the answer is no. I keep hearing economists and political scientists and lawyers and newspaper columnists tell us, "Oh, Gramm-Rudman-Mack is horrible. What we ought to do is * * *" and then they have the fancy theories. I hear politicians on the floor of the House and in the other body say, "Oh, we should do something about it," and I hear their theories. It reminds me of an alcoholic who is faced with the grim absolute reality that he has two choices, quit drinking, or become a drunk. I would suggest in that sense this Congress can force itself to a difficult, complex mechanism, the Gramm-Rudman-Mack mechanism, to really move toward a balanced budget, to really move toward lower interest rates, to really move toward a stable, honest dollar, or we can continue to pretend we are capable of social spending. The fact is, we know in this body there are at least 140 spendaholics, people so committed to spending that at every opportunity they automatically spend. That they in fact form a majority of the Democratic Party's caucus, that they pick the chairmen of the committees and subcommittees and decide what will be on the calendar. And that those spendaholics are literally incapable of controlling spending. So we either adopt something as difficult, as analogous, as clumsy as Gramm-Rudman-Mack, and "go on the wagon" in terms of spending or in the name of being sophisticated we end up much like the common drunk, spending so much money, borrowing so much money, that we cause the very panic and the very crisis in our economy that we wish to avoid. Therefore, I have now concluded that every citizens' group interested in balancing the budget, interested in lower interest rates, interested in a stable, honest dollar to increase our ability to trade internationally to compete with foreign countries, every citizens' group with those interests should fight to make Gramm-Rudman-Mack successful.

They should be aggressively vigilant against efforts to avoid or weaken its commitment to deficit reduction. With sufficient citizen support this law will prove to be the path back to a balanced budget.

Second, in shrinking Government spending we must distinguish between current consumption and investment in the future. We should favor the latter. Our ability to defend freedom, compete in the world market, participate in the information-industrial revolution, provide growing real income, improve standards of living for our children and grandchildren, pay for the health care and retirement of our parents and grandparents, and carry the burden of our national debt, requires that our spending priorities change. We must learn that building a space station instead of propping up inefficient social service programs will provide a greater return on our investment and increase our resources in the future for precisely the social service programs we want.

We must learn the value of scientific research, we must learn the value of building new infrastructures instead of maintaining old bureaucracies.

Creating an opportunity society will require reversing the biases of the liberal welfare state. An opportunity society will almost always lean toward favoring an investment in the future over higher consumption in the present.

And let me say, furthermore, that I listened carefully to my colleague from Massachusetts, a member of the Appropriations Committee, and I sympathize with the deep sense of frustration he feels in his earlier, very eloquent statement about the difficulties in implementing Gramm-Rudman.

But the question is, can we voluntarily put together on the floor of the House a majority that will set priorities, a majority that will choose wisely?

Frankly, I favor keeping the Coast Guard at full strength and think it is foolish to weaken the Coast Guard or the Internal Revenue Service or the Federal Bureau of Investigation. But I am willing to give up specific programs in order to do that. I am willing to set priorities and say, yes, we badly need law enforcement to stop the cocaine trade; that means we may not be able to do everything we wanted to. I am also willing to raise specific user fees to make sure that people who get the services in directed areas raise the money to pay for that particular area.

I am not willing either to raise general taxes, because that way we can avoid controlling and shrinking bureaucracy, or to avoid the tough job of setting priorities.

If in fact the Comptroller General is being dumb about how he sets priorities, there is a simple answer. The Congress can set better priorities. But until the Congress passes them, it is pretty unfair to simply say, I do not like what is happening. We in the Congress have the opportunity, we have the obligation before October 1 to set the right priorities, but we must recognize that priorities are necessary.

Third, despite the political dangers involved, we simply have to confront the problems created by the generational transfer of wealth. For two generations, the liberal welfare state's equivalent of a pyramid scheme worked well. America came out of World War II wealthy enough and with large enough advantages in technology that we could sustain living beyond our means. However, for 35 years, our competitors saved more, worked harder, and invested more in economic growth than we did. Now, we can no longer afford to spend at the expense of saving and investing for later.

Longer lifespans and slower population growth also guarantee that we must rethink our ideas about retirement and then restructure our programs to fit the new reality. We must face the fact that our pension programs must be reformed. Adopting Congressman ARLAN STANGELAND'S fair COLA plan would be a good first step toward real reform.

The facts are simple. When we began adopting, for example, the retired Federal employees program in the 1920's the average American lived to be about 55, and we set the retirement age at 55. When we began adopting Social Security in the 1930's, medicine had improved the average life span to 63, and we adopted a program where you retired at 65 2 years after the average person had died.

Furthermore, in the 1930's, there were 13 workers for every single person who was going to retire. By the 1980's, the average person lives to be 78, and there are only three workers for every retired person. By the year 2000, we will be going toward two persons for every retired person, and I hope people will live even longer, into their eighties.

But an America which is living into its eighties is an America which has to recognize that we must rethink everything from nursing homes to Medicare, to pension systems to retirement ages, and the time has come to be honest with ourselves and not keep running down the road toward disaster.

It is foolish because of political fear, because of demagoguery by those on the left who seek to preserve the liberal welfare state, to automatically run home and say to the baby boomers, "There is nothing I can do but sustain this rickety system that you honestly believe will not survive."

Today 68 percent of the baby boom generation are convinced that there will not be a retirement system for them when it is their turn, and their children believe in even greater numbers that they are being taxed to keep up systems that simply will not be there.

The time to get America's house in order is now, and that requires rethinking the generational redistribution of wealth.

Fourth, the pressure for protectionism in America relates directly to the concern for jobs. Without a chance for better jobs, workers will cling to the old, but certain, jobs. Without adequate adult education and training, workers will remain committed to dying industries offering no future for them. Workers read articles about European export subsidies and the realities of Japanese trade practices and react angrily. The emotional reaction to the threat of unemployment easily overrides the academic argument for an open American market in a world in which other markets are clearly regulated.

Only by creating a competitive, dynamic, job producing, growth-oriented American economy can we avert the pressures of protectionism. That is why every budget issue and every tax question should be carefully examined for its impact on jobs and growth.

A multi-billion-dollar budget cut that eliminates our aerospace research, or advantages in creating jobs, our scientific research base, and our infrastructure investment is a cut that guarantees growing protectionism. It eats the seed corn of the future. It may let us eat better tonight, but guarantees that we will starve in the future.

On the other hand, a budget cut that eliminates current consumption while deliberately protecting or even increasing investments in economic growth is a budget that enables America to avoid protectionism.

In short, we may have to eat less corn tonight to be able to plant some corn in the morning; but in the long run, we will have a lot more to eat.

The question of economic growth transcends the question of America's ability to compete with Japan and Germany. A growing America will be able to absorb the Mexican, Brazilian, and Argentine imports, which are necessary for those countries to pay off their huge debts to American banks. A decaying America will elect politicians committed to withdrawing from the world market. Such a withdrawal could trigger a bank crisis comparable to that of the 1930's.

Creating tax, regulatory, and budget conditions necessary for economic growth is the current challenge to American government. This approach is the only one which will sustain world trade and the world banking system.

Fifth, the requirement of changing from the liberal welfare state to an opportunity society and of maintaining economic growth prohibit any significant tax increase. The Washington establishment will never change spending priorities from present consumption to future investment if they can avoid it. A tax increase allows them to avoid setting priorities and to continue to appease special interests instead of setting priorities. Similarly, politicians will not address the fundamental challenges of reforming our retirement systems and generational redistribution of wealth as long as they can avoid it. A tax increase buys more time for the politicians at the expense of the Nation.

A tax increase large enough to help with the deficit is a tax increase large enough to cause a recession. That recession will probably trigger a wave of protectionism, which may in turn trigger default by the Third World debtor nations and a monetary crisis. It's clear that a large tax increase would be the worst possible medicine. We would have treated the cancer of deficits by triggering the heart attack of economic panic. Ironically, a tax increase would actually increase the deficit by lessening revenues due to loss of jobs and world trade.

Thus, such a tax increase would have effects similar to the Smoot-Hawley tariff.

For those who are not history majors, the Smoot-Hawley tariff was the massive tariff increase which led to the crisis of 1930 to 1935, when the entire world economy came to a grinding halt.

Eventually a giant tax increase could lead to the economic debacle we are seeking to avoid.

Deficits do matter. The deficit of the U.S. Government is irresponsible and unsustainable. We must shrink the debt, but with a constant commitment to economic growth in jobs and in take-home pay.

We have all studied the lessons of the 1929 crash and the Great Depression. We all know that we must do better and avoid the same fate. Now is the time to prove that we can do it.

That is why I believe the centerpiece of this Congress, the centerpiece of politics in America for the next few years, the centerpiece of the 1988 Presidential campaign, will be the choice between politics as usual and a new generation of ideas and a new generation of leadership. There are going to be demagogues who rush out who say, "Oh, don't cut anything." There are going to be people, interest groups, special Washington lobbies, newsletters written by paid political consultants who work for a variety of liberal welfare state lobbies, and they are going to flood the country, and they are going to say, "If the politicians don't give you everything you want right this minute, throw a temper tantrum."

The reaction of the liberal welfare and liberal welfare state politicians and liberal welfare state interest groups could be described as the temper tantrum of 1986. Like petulant children who do not get everything they want, they think if only they roll on the floor kicking and screaming, they will get the evening cookies.

But the fact is if we politicians give in, if we prove we lack the courage to start moving toward a balanced budget, to control the deficit, to fight inflation, to bring down interest rates, to create the jobs and economic growth of the future, to rebuild America's competitive position compared to Japan or Germany, if we lack that courage, if instead of a new generation of ideas and new generation of leadership we go back to politics as usual, if instead of making decisions for the next generation, the baby boomers and their children, we make decisions for this November, then I think we risk enormous, enormous problems.

The real challenge to the average American citizen, I think, is to ask the larger questions, not the petty, smaller questions. The real question, as President Kennedy said in his inaugural address of 1961, is to ask not what America can do for you, but ask what you can do for your country.

At townhall meetings I am going to be challenging the citizens of my district to look at the bigger picture first, look at the $200-billion-a-year deficits, look at the $2 trillion we owe, look at the massive debt with Japan and with Germany, look at the jobs we are losing because we cannot compete, look at our lack of savings. And then ask them to tell me: Are you really willing to give me instructions to come back to Washington to borrow more money from your children and grandchildren?

We used to have a dream, I think, here in America that we would together pay off the debt, pay off the mortgage, and leave our children a little better off. It used to be a proud thing when the family could pay off the mortgage and leave their children the farm. Today, as a country, we are selling the farm and leaving our children the mortgage.

I am personally willing to go home and ask people to rehire me based on a simple, straightforward belief that the time has come to stand up to be counted, to have the guts to put this country back in shape, to do what is necessary.

Does that mean a lot of people are going to be hurt? Of course they are going to be hurt. The question is: How badly?

Is it not possible for this Congress to work together, to make sure that no one is damaged severely, that no interest group has to suffer unduly?

On the other hand, there are agencies that should not exist. There are people working for the Federal Government today who cannot type. They should not still be working. We need to change the civil service laws so that at least you can do the job you get hired for. There are things we ought to privatize. There are a lot of places we ought to look at that maybe private business could do it better. Maybe we should give back certain functions to business or to local government.

I am willing to ask my cities and counties: What regulations would you like to have the Federal Government to take off of you if we refuse to send you the money?

Maybe we can work out a commonsense solution.

I am willing to ask my health care community: How can we change the rules of the game so you can take care of everybody who needs health care in Carroll County or Douglas County or Clayton County?

I am willing to go home and look at a lot of solutions and work with a lot of people. But I am willing to go to my townhall meetings not out of fear, not out of cowering away from some Washington-based liberal welfare state newsletter that attacks me because that special interest wants its goodies, no matter what it does to our children and grandchildren. I am going to go home first and educate my people on the history of where we are; and I am going to, second, lay out the options. If they want a giant tax increase and a recession and a collapse of world trade, that is a possibility. Are they willing to take that money out of their take-home pay? Do they want to borrow the money from their grandchildren and their children? Do they want to go home that night and say: "Yep, I told Congressman GINGRICH, 'You go back to Washington and borrow all that money,' " and, later on say to Sally, who is 9 years old, "When you get to be old enough, you can pay off my debt"?

If they can look their kids in the face and say, "I am not willing to say no, so I am going to take it away from you because you cannot vote yet," then they will know better who they are. And then when America is in trouble, they will know who got it there.

But what I found over the last few weeks is when you talk about where America is at today, when you lay out the question, "Do you really want politics as usual, or are you ready for a new generation of ideas and a new generation of leadership?" again and again the people of my district were saying, "Get the job done. Let's get this place back in shape, let's compete economically with Japan and Germany, let's create more jobs and take-home pay, let's make sure that our children and our grandchildren inherit an America that is strong, that is productive, that is prosperous, that is able to compete with anybody anywhere in the world."

I think the people of Georgia are ready for that challenge, they want to work together to solve the problems, they would like a Congress that does not bellyache and hide and get involved in politics as usual. They would like a chance to see leadership for a change.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE LAMONT-LODGE LETTERS

HON. TED WEISS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, Corliss Lamont has long been one of our Nation's most principled and articulate voices on questions of public and foreign policy. If his warnings of the emerging folly of our Vietnam policy had been heeded in time, thousands of lives might have been saved and untold suffering avoided.

An exchange of letters between Corliss Lamont and Henry Cabot Lodge, who served as Ambassador to South Vietnam, has now been published in Harvard Magazine. The correspondence begins with Corliss Lamont's open letter to Lodge dated November 1, 1965, and concludes with Lodge's revealing note of August 2, 1984. This material is of special relevance as we again consider proposals to escalate U.S. military involvement in the Third World. I commend the text of these letters to the attention of all Members of the House.

Corliss Lamont and the late Henry Cabot Lodge were classmates and close friends, but throughout the course of a long-running correspondence they were fierce political adversaries. The Vietnam war brought the two into opposition once more, resulting in a series of public and private documents that deserve a place in the historical record of the Vietnam era.

In November 1965, when Lodge was in his second tour as U.S. Ambassador in Saigon, Lamont wrote a long open letter reproving him for supporting a militarily imposed solution to the crisis in Vietnam. Lodge tenaciously defended the Johnson administration's position in a communication that the New York World Journal Tribune published in September 1966. Lamont replied in a second open letter. Lodge did not respond, but long afterward, in the summer of 1984, he wrote Lamont a brief and compelling note resolving their disagreement.

Lamont's first open letter is reprinted below in slightly shortened form; Lodge's newspaper statement appears in full.

LAMONT TO LODGE

Dear Cabot: You will recall that as classmates in the great Harvard Class of 1924, we both helped to found the Harvard Debating Union, and that you and I had brisk exchanges at its meetings. Ever since, we have carried on a running debate concerning basic issues that have confronted our country and the world. You consistently maintained a conservative position, and before long became a prominent member of the Republican Party. In my judgment you were always one of the better Republicans.

Now our disagreement has become more far-reaching and fundamental than ever because of your active support, as American Ambassador to South Vietnam, of the Johnson Administration's cruel, illegal and immoral war of aggression in Vietnam. Furthermore, you were willing to become Ambassador a second time precisely when Marshal Ky, the new Premier of the South Vietnamese Government, had proclaimed that his great hero was Adolf Hitler.

Like Secretary Rusk and the U.S. State Department, you have pretended that South Vietnam was established as a permanent independent state in the Geneva Accords of 1954, whereas you well know that the division of Vietnam into South Vietnam and North Vietnam was designed as a temporary measure and that the Accords provided for all Vietnam elections in 1956 to unify the country. You must be aware, too, that it was the United States and its puppet, President Diem of South Vietnam, that refused to permit these elections and thus clearly violated the Geneva treaty.

As Walter Lippmann has pointed out: "While our government endorsed the Geneva agreements, and especially the provision for free elections, it opposed free elections when it realized that Ho Chi Minh (President of North Vietnam) would win them. Gen. Eisenhower states this frankly in his memoirs. Since that time, we have insisted that South Vietnam is an independent nation." (New York Herald Tribune, April 20, 1965). What all of this adds up to is that in this matter the United States has been guilty of double-dealing and a failure to honor its pledged word.

The inscription on the seal of Harvard is Veritas, a motto that has deep meaning for Harvard men. Do you really think, Cabot, that you are serving Truth when you join in distorting the meaning and history of the Geneva Accords that are so basic to understanding the situation in Vietnam?

Again, every objective observer knows that the National Liberation Front in South Vietnam, with its military arm—the so-called Vietcong—is leading a nationalist uprising supported by the vast majority of the population. The fact that Communists strongly back this revolution and share in its leadership does not nullify its indigenous character. What we have here is the resolute and unyielding effort of a former colonial people to assert its freedom. Opposing this is a white Western nation, the U.S.A., determined to re-impose shackles such as France maintained for almost a century. As the noted British historian Arnold Toynbee tells us, the Vietcong struggle is part of a world-wide "revolt of the 'native' majority of mankind against the domination of the Western minority."

The Vietcong guerrillas possess effective modern weapons in considerable quantity, but only a trickle of arms reached them from North Vietnam (at least up to February 1965). It is the United States that has been the main source of supply. For the guerrillas have obtained their guns chiefly from deserters bringing in American-made arms or by capturing such arms from the apathetic troops of the South Vietnamese Government.

In spite of these well-recognized facts, the U.S. Government last February, when it realized the Vietcong was winning the civil war, suddenly started intensive bombing of Communist North Vietnam on the specious ground that that country all along had been invading South Vietnam and bore the major responsibility for the troubles there. Johnson and his military advisors invented this line in order to justify their own savage aggression against North Vietnam.

This crass propaganda issuing from the White House you, Cabot Lodge, have supported all the way in public statements. In your heart of hearts, can you possibly think that this is Veritas? U Thant of the United Nations was right when he said in reference to Vietnam: "In times of war and of hostilities, the first casualty is truth."

You have also misled your fellow Americans by claiming that the U.S. Government's purpose in Vietnam is to save freedom and establish democracy. In fact, starting with the brutal dictator Diem, the United States has bolstered up one puppet dictatorship after another in Saigon—nine different governments in the past two years—as successive military coups have taken place. These South Vietnamese governments rule through police-state methods of crude violence, terror and torture. None of them would have lasted a week without the military support of the United States. . . .

In all frankness, Cabot, how can you sleep nights when you sanction the horrible and wholesale slaughter by U.S. bombers of women, children and peasants—on noncombatant civilians in general—throughout Vietnam? In the past few months, American planes have repeatedly dropped napalm and heavy-duty bombs indiscriminately on South Vietnam villages where a few Vietcong were "reported" to be. Here is what a U.S. Air Force officer recently told the Associated Press: "When we are in a bind, we unload on the whole area in order to save the situation. We usually kill more women and children than we do Vietcong." In North Vietnam, our bombers have destroyed hospitals and patients, schools and school children, residential houses and civilians. Owing to the terrific bombings in South Vietnam, more than 600,000 destitute refugees have fled to the coastal cities.

You are among those responsible not only for the killing of scores of thousands of Vietnamese, but also for the death of more than 1,000 American soldiers who have resolutely given up their lives in this futile, useless war 10,000 miles from our Pacific Coast—a madcap adventure in which the United States has already wasted billions of dollars collected from American taxpayers. The probabilities are all against our winning this conflict, even if our trigger-happy President sends 1,000,000 troops to Vietnam. We cannot win because of the jungle terrain, because the overwhelming majority of the Vietnamese people is opposed to the U.S. intervention and because no stable, effective government can be established in Saigon.

Yet the United States buildup increases at a rapid rate. On June 30, 1964, a well-known U.S. diplomat was asked what he thought would be the consequences of massive American involvement in Vietnam. His answer was:

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.
Matter set in this typeface indicates words inserted or appended, rather than spoken, by a Member of the House on the floor.

Well, that means we become a colonial power and I think it's been pretty well established that colonialism is over. I believe if you start doing that you will get all kinds of unfortunate results: you'll stir up anti-foreign feeling; there'll be a tendency to lay back and let the Americans do it and all that. I can't think that it's a good thing to do.

My dear classmate, do you know who said that? Why, it was none other than the Honorable Henry Cabot Lodge, then serving his first term as Ambassador to South Vietnam. So now that long-suffering country is, as implied by your own words, fast becoming a U.S. colony. Are you hoping soon to become Governor of the fifty-first American State—South Vietnam?

Please consider carefully that if the President keeps on escalating this Vietnam conflict and grabbing more and more Asian real estate, the Soviet Union and Communist China will surely react with far more effective countermeasures than they have used hitherto. Herein lies a terrible danger. For continuing escalation could finally erupt into the Great Nuclear War that would bring untold devastation to the U.S.A. and many other countries. Johnson and you, Cabot, are gambling with the survival of our Nation and of the human race itself.

Addressing you now as a former Senator, there is a special point I want to make: As a member of the U.S. Senate for many years, you ought to be much concerned with the prerogatives and powers of that august body as set forth in the American Constitution. Today, President Johnson is usurping the functions of both the Senate and the House of Representatives by taking this country into a de facto war in Vietnam and thus bypassing the Constitution's pronouncement in Article I, Section 8, that Congress alone has the power to declare and make war.

You, as an ex-Senator, should be one of the first to protest against the President's dictatorial flouting of the Constitution—an obvious illegality that is contributing towards the breakdown of democratic government in the United States.

I should think that you, Cabot, as a former U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations pledged to uphold its Charter and international law in general, could not but suffer many qualms of conscience in upholding the President's current foreign policy. For the Administration's brutal course of action in Vietnam flagrantly violates the Charter of the United Nations, the Geneva Accords of 1945, the principles laid down at the Nuremberg Trials of Nazi war criminals, and the 1949 Geneva Convention of the International Red Cross dealing with the "rules of war."

As a member of the United States diplomatic corps, you cannot be unaware that President Johnson's Vietnam venture has seriously set back American influence and prestige virtually everywhere in the world. Even America's own allies are really appalled. On the shelf for the duration are the pressing tasks of working out disarmament agreements regarding both nuclear and conventional weapons. And in general, to cite Walter Lippmann again, "The war in Vietnam is blocking the progress of the nations, including that of Red China itself, towards the peaceable coexistence and accommodation which is the predominant need of all peoples." (New York Herald Tribune, Oct. 12, 1965.)

The way out of the Vietnam mess is clear. There must be a cessation of U.S. bombing in all of Vietnam and a general cease-fire; a peace conference that includes the National Liberation Front as an independent authority in its own right, and the various nations directly involved; and a settlement that returns to the original Geneva Accords. This would mean the complete withdrawal of the U.S. Army and all other foreign troops from South Vietnam; a guarantee against any foreign military bases in that country; and elections to enable the Vietnamese people freely to choose their own government in accordance with the long-established principles of self-determination.

It is often said that America would lose face if it gets out of Vietnam without winning a clear-cut victory. But the United States has already lost so much face because of its barbaric conduct in Vietnam that this argument has little merit. In all truth, our country would gain great prestige by retiring from Vietnam, just as did France and President de Gaulle when they finally agreed to Algeria's independence. . . .

In conclusion, then, I urge you, Cabot Lodge, to stop abetting President Johnson's evil actions and designs in Vietnam. It would be an enormous pity at this advanced stage of your career for you to fatally tarnish your reputation by qualifying as a leading War Hawk. Resign your ambassadorship and rebuild your public image before it is too late! The highest patriotism is not militaristic; it is to strive for justice and peace and that international amity which is the best assurance for America's national security. Come home and help transform the Republican Party into the great American Peace Party, opposed to U.S. military intervention in Asia, Latin America, or anywhere else. On that platform you and the Republicans might well win another election.

LODGE ON VIETNAM

This may be an appropriate time to summarize why the suppression of aggression in Vietnam is important—especially so important as to justify the present active involvement of the United States.

To give a brief answer to a big question, I submit, first, that to suppress aggression is morally right since the suppression of aggression has a high priority on the list of the purposes of the United Nations which are embodied in its charter. And the United Nations Charter is the most widely adhered to code of behavior for nations.

Then, to the United Nations Charter should be added the Southeast Asia Treaty and the numerous acts by Congress on the subject which give our involvement in Vietnam not only a moral but a legal base.

Finally, our involvement is a matter of prudence and wisdom, sagacity and self-defense.

If the Communist aggression against Vietnam were to be successful and we were to be expelled and they were to seize the country, a situation of danger would be created which could scarcely be exaggerated and which would make our present situation seem as safe as a church.

No one recognizes this more than the leaders of the other Asian countries. They know if Vietnam goes under, the repercussions would soon come in Thailand, the Philippines, Malaysia and Taiwan. History shows that aggression feeds on itself and that one aggression encourages another.

Do we want to wait until the aggression is lapping at the shores of Japan and Australia, bringing on the worldwide holocaust which a threat to these countries would involve?

Clearly such a defeat would shake confidence in us not only in Asia, but also in the Atlantic community. It would thus endanger peace everywhere.

Clearly, the United States is not trying to be policeman for the whole world. We are not making our stand on the peaks of the Himalayan Mountains. But neither should we wait to defend our country until the enemy is either on the sands of Waikiki Beach or on the sands of Cape Cod.

For this great Vietnamese sweep of coast, with one of the greatest food producing areas of the world at its southern end, to fall to the aggressor would be a direct threat to our security in this shrunken world.

If you look at the map, you can see this country is in the middle of Southeast Asia—a sort of strategic keystone. What happens to it affects all of Southeast Asia. But it also has a direct and vital effect on us.

The American fighting man who is here is quite simply and plainly fighting for his country.

HENRY CABOT LODGE,

U.S. Ambassador to South Vietnam, September 13, 1966.

LAMONT TO LODGE

"Your letter to the World Journal Tribune attempts to bamboozle the readers of that newspaper by omitting any mention of the Geneva Accords of 1954," wrote Lamont in his second open letter to Lodge, dated October 6, 1966. "The aim is to attempt the frameup of a whole country, to mislead the American people into believing that North Vietnam is the aggressor instead of the power-mad big bully—the United States of America."

Lamont reiterated some of the points he had made in his first open letter, but rhetorically he went further, addressing his old friend as "Mr. Major General" [Lodge's rank in the Army Reserve], "General Lodge," and "Proconsul Lodge (as they call you in Europe)." In modern times, he asserted,

. . . Many ambassadors have been mere messenger boys for their governments. But as Ambassador to South Vietnam you have been much more than that. . . . Utilizing your own special study of counter insurgency as taught by the U.S. Army, you have helped plan military strategy. You have advised American generals on how to combat the Vietcong, and Vietnamese generals on how to stage coups to install new U.S. stooges.

Since his previous letter, Lamont noted, the U.S. had raised its commitment of troops in Vietnam from 150,000 to 315,000, and

. . . no matter how many soldiers Johnson pours into Vietnam and how much of our treasure he spends for the killing of Vietnamese, the United States can never win this war. The Pentagon estimates that in a guerrilla operation of this kind the United States must have for victory a ratio of 10 to 1 against the enemy. Even if Johnson sends over 1,000,000 men, it is not too difficult for the Vietcong and North Vietnamese to provide 200,000 additional fighters to match them in the jungle terrain. And if the U.S. raises the ante to 2,000,000, then China will come in and easily marshal 400,000 men. . . . What we are doing in Vietnam is to sink deeper and deeper into the worst military trap in our history.

You, General Lodge, are caught in this same trap and are throwing your reputation, earned in peaceful and useful public service, down the drain. . . .

In closing, Lamont added:

It is possible that eventually our correspondence may prove to have some historic importance. And I am confident that in judging between us, history and the conscience of America will find you to have been terribly wrong about Vietnam.

LODGE TO LAMONT

In the spring of 1967 Lodge resigned as ambassador to Vietnam. Subsequently he served as ambassador-at-large, ambassador to Germany, chief negotiator at the 1969 Paris peace talks, and special envoy to the Vatican.

In the summer of 1984 he wrote for the last time to Lamont, who had sent him a copy of his autobiography. Reconciling an unsettled account that was almost two decades old. Lodge went straight to the point.

Dear Corliss, regarding your open letter of November 1, 1965 concerning me. You were right. We were wrong and we failed. I should have resigned sooner.

Thank you for your most interesting book which I am reading with avidity.

Best wishes always,

CABOT

August 2

Lodge died on February 27, 1985. His forty-year record of public service had included three terms in the Senate, seven years as U.S. delegate to the United Nations, and the Republican vice presidential nomination in 1960.

Lamont, a self-styled "moderate radical," continues to write and lecture. A New Yorker, he is chairman of the National Emergency Civil Liberties Committee. Recently he endowed an annual lecture at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government, to be given by a person "widely recognized for leadership in diminishing the risk of nuclear war."

TRIBUTE TO REV. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, January 20 marked the first Federal observance of the birthday of Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., a holiday established to celebrate his life and his beliefs. I want to express my complete support for this holiday. It gives us time to remember the work that Reverend King began and the dreams that he instilled in all Americans.

Reverend King dedicated his life to working for the freedom of all humankind. He called on each and every one of us to seek social justice and economic opportunity. He led boycotts, sit-ins, demonstrations, and other peaceful forms of protest. Despite the fact that he was often met with firehoses, tear gas, and prison sentences, Reverend King continued undaunted and undeterred.

Although much work still remains to be done to fulfill his dream for us, Reverend King influenced numerous civil rights victories. In 1955, he led a boycott of the Montgomery bus system in Alabama because of their discriminatory policies. A year later, the city of Montgomery declared an end to racial segregation on the buses. This was one of his first victories. He later witnessed the signing of the 1964 Civil Rights Act which eliminated "white only" signs from public places and guaranteed equal job and educational opportunities for all. In 1965, he was on hand to watch President Johnson sign the Voting Rights Act, which made it illegal to ask for literacy tests and other voting restrictions which had effectively prevented thousands of blacks from voting.

But, perhaps more than anything else, the life of Rev. Martin L. King demonstrated that it was possible for people of different races and backgrounds to work together peacefully to achieve social and economic progress. He gave his life to the advancement of humankind. The best tribute we can pay to him and his life is to answer that call.

MANY ACHIEVEMENTS OF GRANT TINKER

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues the distinguished career of Mr. Grant Tinker, chairman of the board and the chief executive officer of the National Broadcasting Co.

From his work as the head of the prestigious production company, MTM Enterprises, to his extremely influential role as NBC's chief executive, Mr. Tinker has made outstanding contributions to the world of network television, and thus has helped to enrich the lives of millions of Americans. I salute Mr. Tinker for his continual efforts at improving the face of commercial television.

His many achievements are highlighted in an article from the October 20, 1985, Boston Globe Magazine. I would like to share some excerpts from this article with my colleagues:

TINKER'S A-PLUS TEAM

(By Ed Siegel)

He is, he wants you to know, a tinker. The poster over his desk with the dictionary entry even spells it out: "tinker, n. an unskillful or clumsy worker; a bungler."

He is not, he wants you to know, the phoney Grant Tinker who comes on Late Night with David Letterman to hawk RCA stereo television sets or give guided tours of the NBC commissary.

To anyone who knows him—or has even just met him—he is neither of those Tinkers, the Webster's bungler nor the corpulent caricature who cheapskates his way across the Letterman landscape.

The real Grant Tinker is the elegantly dressed, athletically trim, and gracefully articulate 59-year-old chairman of the board of the National Broadcasting Company, who, first as head of the prestigious production company MTM Enterprises and now as chief executive officer of NBC, may have done more than any other individual to change the face of network television since the late 1950s.

Tinker even looks like the ultimate McLuhan-esque television man—cool, relaxed, self-confident, alternately glib and avuncular.

If no one has seen Grant Tinker walk on water, no one doubts that he has led NBC to the promised land in the four years that he has been in charge. Consider that when Tinker took over from Fred Silverman, NBC's failed leader, the network was barely breaking even. Consider that in 1985, NBC became the first network in history to sell $1 billion worth of prime-time advertising before the fall season even began.

Along the way, Tinker seems to have won the kind of admiration usually reserved for subjects of obituaries. Says William P. Croasdale, vice president of Batten, Barton, Durstine & Osborn (better known as BBDO), one of the country's most powerful advertising agencies. "I cannot be high enough in my praise for this man, not only for what he has done, but for the statesmanlike fashion in which he has done it. My reaction was like a lot of others—I knew the job that he had done at MTM, but I knew the quagmire he was walking into. . . . The big thing he brought was stability. Historically, whenever a new chieftain came in, you expected heads to roll, a whole new team brought in. He did some pruning, but he gave Brandon [Tartikoff, head of programming for NBC under both Silverman and Tinker] the support he needed."

Norman Lear, creator of All in the Family and a vocal critic of network television, says, "There's no doubt in my mind that corporate America lives with a total obsession of dealing with the short term. Among the companies that are the best in trying not to do that is NBC since Grant got there. Tartikoff and he have done some brilliant things."

Sy Yanoff, now general manager of CBS Boston affiliate Channel 7, who was general manager of NBC affiliate Channel 4 when Tinker was hired by NBC, recalls. "The first speech he gave to the affiliates was very realistic about the length of time it would take and what he hoped to accomplish with quality programming. I was very impressed with him from the start. He had a self-confidence that was very reassuring. . . . A couple of years later, the affiliates wanted Tartikoff's head, and he never gave it to them. It was a stroke of genius, Tartikoff bearing a lot of responsibility for their accomplishments in prime time."

Even television critics, not known for their love of network executives, voted him their first lifetime-achievement award last year, with Tinker outpolling the rest of the candidates put together.

But what Tinker did—make lots of money for NBC—is less impressive than how he did it: with more quality programs than any commercial network has ever provided at one time: Hill Street Blues (when he was head of MTM), Cheers, Family Ties, St. Elsewhere, Remington Steele, Late Night with David Letterman, Miami Vice, The Cosby Show, Steven Spielberg's Amazing Stories, and Golden Girls.

None of these shows is exactly Death of a Salesman, but together they are indicative of programming that had all but gone out of style 10 years ago—literate (or, as New York magazine television critic John Leonard said of Miami Vice, postliterate), witty, emotional, sometimes even exhilarating.

THE RICHARD BRINSLEY SHERIDAN SHOW

Tinker was born in Stamford, Connecticut. His father was in the lumber business, providing a comfortable but not lavish upbringing. Like Tartikoff, Tinker became an Ivy League English major. At Dartmouth in 1949 he wrote his thesis on the comedy of Richard Brinsley Sheridan and then embarked on his first tour of duty with NBC, as a management trainee ("Can't you see a direct line from Sheridan to Cosby?" he says). He would leave (in 1952, for a stint as a television executive for advertising agencies), come back (in 1961, as a programming vice president), and leave again—in 1967 to become programming executive of Universal and 20th Century Fox Studios.

Tinker married Mary Tyler Moore in 1962, and in 1970 the two formed the production company that would bear her initials and produce her program, The Mary Tyler Moore Show, for CBS. (Tinker's first marriage produced a daughter and three sons, two of whom work on St. Elsewhere.) After 11 years of developing MTM into a highly regarded, effectively run organization, Tinker received the call for his third coming to NBC.

After a year or so into the job. The news division was in a shambles, playing musical anchors on the evening news, not being able to come up with a prime-time magazine, and losing viewers in the morning to Good Morning, America. Daytime serials were still lagging far behind those on ABC and CBS. And broadcasting and advertising executives were wondering about Tinker as NBC renewed four programs whose ratings would have spelled termination on just about any other network in any other year—Cheers, St. Elsewhere, Remington Steele, and Family Ties. And fans of quality television were angered when NBC canceled four other highly regarded programs—SCTV, Fame, NBC News Overnight, and Taxi.

There was another disgruntled observer. At the 1983 Emmy ceremonies, which in retrospect marked the turning point for NBC, the network won 33 awards, compared with 14 for ABC, 11 for CBS, and 4 for PBS. One of the winners was Judd Hirsch as best actor in a comedy series—the just canceled Taxi. Hirsch used the occasion to lash NBC for canceling the program: He held up the Emmy statue and proceeded to berate both Tinker and the network.

Tinker, whose network was dominating the Emmys that night—and has been the leader ever since—did not look like a happy man. "At the moment, it happened so quickly it was more embarrassing than painful, because, you know, you're sitting in an audience and you can't react," he says.

But it wasn't quality programming that was responsible for solving NBC's immediate problems. In January, the month each year that the networks' second season begins, NBC introduced three programs as midseason replacements. In 1983 it began a series that would be its only Top 20 hit at the time—The A-Team. In January of 1984 came two more replacements—TV's Bloopers and Practical Jokes and Riptide.

All three were enormous commercial successes, but none was exactly Emmy material. NBC was becoming financially solvent, but critics were starting to ask if making money with mindless programming was all there was to the Tinker-Tartikoff strategy.

THE PEACOCK FLIES

Tinker was sounding frustrated in interviews at that point. For the second time in his career, he was blamming the TV audience for the wretched programming they were getting. In the mid-1970s, the success of ABC programs like Happy Days and Three's Company was driving MTM and Norman Lear programs off the air. Tinker was telling the press then that he didn't know whether he belonged in television anymore. He told television critic Gary Deeb, "If things get really bad, I don't think I could start doing Mork and Mindy just to make a living. I might just find another line of work." But then came the success of Lou Grant and M-A-S-H, and things seemed more hopeful.

In 1983, as head of NBC, Tinker was again sounding depressed. He was attacking the television audience for preferring junk to quality and warning that if junk was what the audience wanted, junk was what they were going to get. It was getting harder to make programs like Lou Grant, he said. He and Tartikoff even turned down a program for being "too literate."

But while The A-Team and Bloopers were setting the tone on one front, the Tinker-Tartikoff strategy of staying with quality shows was starting to pay off. Hill Street Blues had become a bona fide hit, attracting the most viewers from 10 to 11 p.m. on Thurdays. Cheers was inching toward the Top 20. Remington Steele was reaping the benefits of the two programs that aired before it—The A-Team and Riptide. St. Elsewhere was making marginal but steady rating gains, as was Late Night with David Letterman.

Even more important, NBC was deriving some enormous fringe benefits from its quality programs. According to Tartikoff, the reason for coming up with programs like Hill Street Blues and Cheers was to develop programs with an urban appeal: "In 1981, when we only made $48 million in profits [a pittance for a network, considering the high cost of program development] we tried to work out of the gutter by making shows that could at least help our five stations. [Each network owns at least five television stations, all in major urban areas.] Since they contribute to NBC earnings, we could make half our profits in one place and the other half on the network. Programs like Lobo and B.J. and the Bears and CHiPs were getting 17 shares on our owned stations and 25 shares nationally." Programs like Hill Street and Cheers reversed that trend. (A share is the percentage of television sets in use at a given time. Any program with less than a 21 share is generally considered a failure.)

Quality programming had another financial bonus for NBC. While demographic research was nothing new, the advertising agencies were becoming increasingly sophisticated in using the research for targeting audiences. And the rise of NBC's, more urban—and urbane—programming has gone hand-in-hand with that research. For one thing, women were having children later in life, changing the key demographic age group from 18 through 49 to 21 through 54, and, as one might expect, tastes grew more sophisticated from one demographic to the other. Programs like Laverne and Shirley that made ABC Number 1 in the mid-1970s—and nearly drove Tinker out of television—were passe, and programs like Cheers were in.

And advertisers were asking other questions: How do I reach upscale viewers? How do I reach viewers who don't watch much television? How do I reach homes where cable has bitten into the network share of the audience? In these and other key demographic groups, the answer would come back, advertise on NBC programs such as Hill Street Blues or St. Elsewhere or The A-Team (which, perhaps out of camp appeal, has attracted good demographics). When a program attracts good demographics, the network charges a premium on 30-second commercials. NBC charges as much for a commerical on Hill Street—$200,000—as CBS does for Knots Landing, the more popular of the two shows. In the case of St. Elsewhere, it was that program's demographics, combined with Tinker and Tartikoff's admiration for the program, that saved it from cancellation after the low ratings of the first year.

By the beginning of the 1984-85 season, NBC was in solid financial shape, but it was still well behind CBS and ABC in overall ratings. While ABC was banking on, and failing with, glitzy nighttime soaps such as Paper Dolls and Glitter, NBC introduced three programs that would lift the network from a weak third in the overall ratings to a strong second, behind CBS. One was a sentimental family drama with Michael Landon playing an angel come to Earth. Highway to Heaven may have drawn nothing but guffaws from critics, but it boosted the ratings for the network's Wednesday night lineup.

Had Miami Vice appeared on any other network, it most likely would have been canceled early on as it struggled against competition from CBS' Friday night powerhouse, Falcon Crest. Like its Cheers and St. Elsewhere predecessors, Miami Vice was attracting a slow but steady growth in the ratings, particularly in the demographically desirable categories. And once Falcon Crest went into reruns, Miami Vice began to soar. It went as high as Number 2 one week and seems primed to win in its time period against Falcon Crest this year.

The program that really rocketed NBC out of the ratings cellar combined the commercial success and the family values of Highway to Heaven with the critical success and sophisticated humor of Cheers. Advertising executives had predicted that Jell-O and Coca-Cola salesman Bill Cosby had come up with a hit, but no one foresaw that The Cosby Show would become the most popular program on television, outrating even Dynasty and Dallas by the end of the year. America was so taken by the warmth, wit, and strength of Cosby's vision of family life that the three comedies that followed Cosby on the Thursday night schedule—Family Ties, Cheers, and Night Court—became Top 20 hits themselves.

This year the momentum is clearly on NBC's side. It has three more potential "quality" shows, Steven Spielberg's Amazing Stories (and it's no accident that Spielberg came to NBC with his idea for an anthology series), a new version of Alfred Hitchcock Presents, and a situation comedy about three women in their 50s, Golden Girls, starring Bea Arthur of Maude fame and written by Susan Harris of Soap. NBC also has a potential commercial success in Robert Blake's Hell Town, about an irreverent priest's attempts to keep his poor neighborhood crime-free.

Even if NBC doesn't overtake CBS as the top-rated network, it will almost certainly win more prime-time advertising dollars than either of its competitors, as buyers are climbing aboard the demographic bandwagon. And Tinker's belief that quality programming can be commercially successful has been completely vindicated: "I'm beginning to be a little encouraged again by some of the things that are succeeding—mostly on NBC, I will selfishly say, but maybe elsewhere occasionally, too. . . . I don't know if it can ever happen across the board; there just isn't that much audience that wants that kind of product. But anyway, I'm a little more optimistic and a little more cheerful about it. Look how cheerful I am."

Tinker does indeed look a great deal more cheerful these days than his counterparts at the other networks. Executives at CBS and ABC are even taking lessons from the NBC experience, even if they won't admit it publicly. At ABC, there is talk about giving producers more creative freedom and leaving programs on longer before canceling them—even though, except for Spenser: For Hire, they are probably not worth saving. At CBS, with programs that appeal to an older, more conservative audience, there is a concerted effort to go after younger demographics with programs such as Hometown (already canceled), West 57th, and The Twilight Zone, although none—with the possible exception of Twilight Zone—have the NBC stamp of quality on them.

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1918, the Ukraine issued the "Fourth Universal," a tragically short-lived document declaring its independence.

Yesterday, the city of Buffalo and the county of Erie formally recognized Ukrainian Independence Day, and this afternoon I am proud to co-host a reception commemorating this event.

I would like to take this opportunity to share with you an article written by Mike Vogel for the Buffalo Evening News, and a statement which issued from the 1985 Conference of the Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations and European Freedom Council, submitted by its president, former Ukrainian Prime Minister Yaroslav Stetsko.

The material follows:

[From Heritage]

UKRAINIANS TODAY HONOR DREAM OF FREEDOM

(By Mike Vogel)

Some may call it a dream that faltered, but perhaps it wasn't the dream that faltered, but the world.

This morning, the City of Buffalo and the County of Erie once more offered a joint proclamation honoring the dream, as they commemorated the declaration of independence that freed the Ukraine on Jan. 22, 1918.

The declaration issued in Kiev that day is known more formally as the "Fourth Universal," and it proved to be tragically short-lived. In 1921, Russia exerted its domination over the region, and in 1923 the Ukraine was incorporated into the U.S.S.R.

Every year, though, Ukrainians gather to remember and to celebrate the glory of a moment that ended 200 years of foreign domination and provided a brief window of freedom for a troubled people in a troubled land. There would be more tragedy ahead, in a man-made famine and the devastation of a two-front war, but for those brief months in the Ukraine after 1918 there was a liberty and room to dream, at last.

"It's important that we keep it alive," said Dasha Procyk of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America.

"It's now the 68th year that we are doing it. We feel it's very important to continue, to remember that freedom is something every human being wants."

Sunday, all the churches in the small but active local Ukrainian-American community will offer Masses in remembrance, and a full commemorative program will begin at 2 p.m. in the Common Council Chambers at City Hall. Two survivors of the men who fought for that too-brief freedom will attend.

Nineteen active Ukrainian organizations will participate, and two Ukrainian veterans organizations will present colors. The 36-voice women's choir known as Mriya, the Dream, will perform Ukrainian songs, and two sisters, Laryssa and Myrosia Mychaskiw, will play the bandura. Speeches will be made by Assemblyman Dennis T. Gorski, D-Cheektowaga, and by Dr. Mychajlo Loza.

That is all well and good.

But there is more to this commemoration than just the performances that keep alive an old-world culture in a new-world land. There is a lesson in the tale of the Ukraine.

The lesson is that freedom is not a state, but a process.

There is glory in declaring independence, but that elation bears a continuing price of hard work through the years, as the harshness of the world and the pressures of existence threaten to erode the liberty and tarnish the glory.

After 200 years of domination, the Ukraine tasted that glory. And then it tasted defeat.

Lenin's Russia was one of the nations that recognized Ukrainian sovereignty, but then followed that recognition with a declaration of war.

The world was too much for the fragile freedom that once graced the poppy-strewn fields of a faraway land. Ukrainian freedom fighters were caught between forces fighting for communism and forces fighting for the czar. Freedom, like the poppies, was trampled in the struggle.

Some of those who had fought and lost sought a new land as a haven for their dreams and their freedoms.

They look, now, to a new generation to guard what they found—the fulfillment of dreams, in freedoms that Americans often take for granted.

And while they gather this week to remember what freedom once meant to their homeland, perhaps we would do well to pause and recall what it means to ours.

ANTI-BOLSHEVIK BLOC OF NATIONS AND EUROPEAN FREEDOM COUNCIL

THE PROBLEMS FACING US

Today's attention is focused on the recent summit between President Reagan and Soviet Russian dictator Mikhail Gorbachov. The issue at hand is primarily military. The importance of this issue is a consequence of the gains of Russian imperialism under the guise of communism, whose primary goal is world domination. Only the collapse of the Soviet Russian empire will decidedly eliminate the threat of a nuclear holocaust. To achieve this end, attention must be drawn to the Achilles' Heel of the Soviet Russian empire and its system: the subjugated nations. Without the inclusion of the issue of the subjugated nations into the creation of new realities in the world, all agreements and pacts of exclusively military nature will not eliminate the crisis. The crux of the matter lies not in a change of guard in the Kremlin which will never disavow its imperialism and aggressiveness, but in the striving for freedom and national independence of the subjugated nations. In the final analysis they are the key to the resolution of the world crisis, and in this context they must be viewed as a political superpower.

Naturally, the Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations (ABN) is against nuclear war and proposes its own alternative for the elimination of the root cause of the present world crisis. The ABN supports zero option and stands for the elimination of all nuclear weapons. The ABN also supports the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) as the most humane proposal to date—one which destroys weapons not people. This is a revolutionary idea because from the dawn of man weapons were directed against people, whereas now a plan has been advanced to destroy weapons and not people. Only those who harbour ill will could be opposed to the deployment of such a strategic defense system. Even in the advent of difficulty in implementing such a system based on the SDI, the idea itself is worthy of support for the sake of humanity and plain political decency and wisdom.

No temporary solutions will solve the crisis if lasting solutions are not phased in on a parallel basis. The subject of this conference is precisely to establish a basis for that lasting solution which, in our view, is rooted in the invincible human quest for freedom and independence inherent in every man and nation on earth. The key is to find a way to release the explosive power of revolution among the subjugated nations which, in turn would bring down the Soviet Russian empire—that prison of nations par excellence.

What is the raison d'etre of this world conflict? What does Soviet Russia really seek? Moscow's goal is to hold on to the subjugated nations and to gain control over increasingly more countries until global domination finally is complete. By now the goal should be known to all, although there is a lack of effort to voice this fact loud and clear. The crux of the matter is that Moscow's object of conquest—the captive nations fighting to stay free—be recognized as a power potentially capable of breaking up the imperial structure of Soviet Russia.

By fostering and strengthening by means of the available communications technologies the infrastructures of the subjugated nations and by counterposing our system and philosophy of life to the Bolshevik system a psychostrategic offensive can systematically undermine the Soviet Russian system of occupation. Moreover, if the West would cease its economic and other types of relations with the Soviet Union, if it would stop supplying it with grain, technology, credits, and soon, Moscow would be forced to allow, albeit reluctantly, the revival of socio-economic institutions, such as, for example, the private ownership of land (to increase agricultural production). This, in turn, would strengthen the indigenous infrastructures of the captive nations further undermining the colonial system of Soviet Russia in very real terms.

Soviet Russian imperialism follows many paths and the response to it must be equally varied. It is not a classical type of imperialism, but one which attempts to impose upon the nations it controls a totally alien philosophy and way of life. Given this fact, the liberation process in the subjugated nations cannot be viewed only in military and technical terms because we are dealing here with a revolutionary process encompassing all the spiritual, cultural, social, economic, political and religious dimensions of the existence of those nations. Western psychostrategists should take notice of this unique revolutionary phenomenon taking place behind the Iron Curtain, a phenomenon which can be fully interpreted, analysed and conveyed by those representatives of the subjugated nations who are organically tied to their nation's spirituality and philosophy of life, by those who have not been affected by the scourge of so-called "progressivism" and "new-speak" created by the Soviet Russian "Big Brother" (to use Orwell's concepts) and his system.

The theme of the conference—"High and Low Frontier: Strategic Defense and Liberation"—describes the path to follow if the Free World is eventually to prevail over Soviet Russian totalitarianism. "High Frontier" is the actual implementation of the results of the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI). "Low Frontier" is a psycho-strategic and political offensive against Soviet Russia which should be based on the inclusion of the captive nations as a vital element in the West's own active measures, with a commitment to provide assistance to prospective insurgencies on the territories of the subjugated nations. The combination of "High Frontier" with "Low Frontier" fully addresses the search for a solution to the impasse in the current world crisis, provides a viable alternative to the threat of a nuclear confrontation between Soviet Russia and the West, offers a way out of the sham that the so-called "disarmament process" has become over the decades and, lastly, it provides a blueprint for dismantling the Soviet Russian empire with the least risk to humanity. A synthesis of "High" and "Low" Frontiers is today the only road that can lead to a world of peace, security and freedom for all the nations on earth. The means of achieving a safe and free world are at hand. The United States and the whole Free World must now muster enough political will and moral strength to break out from the vicious circle of false detente, "containment", "spheres of influence", hopes of "convergence of east and west" and embark on the road of saving humanity from oblivion. There is no other alternative.—Yaroslva Stetsko, ABN President, Former Prime Minister of Ukraine.

STUDENTS AND THE GATEWAY TO EXCELLENCE

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, last November, students from across the country joined together in Washington to speak to lawmakers about their concerns over the future of higher education funding.

This meeting, the second "National Student Summit," organized by student government leaders from the City University of New York, was well-attended not only by their fellow student leaders, but also by Members of Congress. In this summit, they sought to focus on the pending reauthorization of the Higher Education Act, H.R. 3700, passed by the House earlier this month.

As New York's senior member of the House Education and Labor Committee, I want to commend the leaders of this meeting, particularly Melvin Lowe, CUNY student senate president and Frank Viggiano, executive director of USS, for their hard work and dedicated efforts to bring this summit to fruition. Their efforts have assisted those of us who are deeply involved in the reauthorization process in helping to focus greater attention on student issues and concerns.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I wish to insert into the RECORD a copy of the statement issued by the student leaders who attended the summit, entitled "Funding for Higher Education: The Gateway to Excellence."

FUNDING FOR HIGHER EDUCATION: THE GATEWAY TO EXCELLENCE

(A Joint Statement from the Second National Student Summit of State and Campus Student Association Leaders)

Student leaders representing more than 6 million students from across the Nation have assembled in Washington, D.C., to defend the Federal role in higher education. National Student Summit II is an outgrowth of the successful National Student Summit I held in May in New York.

This statement is a response to the proposed House of Representatives Reauthorization Bill, H.R. 3700, and it includes a set of recommendations for Senate consideration.

First, while we support the majority of the House Bill, we will take this opportunity to address those areas which will adversely affect student financial aid. Second, although we understand and support the need to reduce the Federal deficit, we express our opposition to the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Amendment because of its implications for student financial aid.

Financial assistance is threatened and discredited by the perpetuation of national myths about financial aid, most notably overexaggerated and inflated loan default rates. Student leaders have highlighted a study confirming the improved status of the Guaranteed Student Loan program collections.

The student leaders at the National Student Summit II represent a united voice of concern. We oppose any changes that reduce access to higher education because it is the key to economic growth, political enfranchisement, and social development.

PROVIDING THE OPPORTUNITY: STUDENT AID

The opportunity to receive a postsecondary education is currently slipping out of the grasp of many citizens in this country as the result of the deterioration of student financial aid programs. Effective student aid makes education affordable at all institutions of higher education. It is the great equalizer between the rich and the poor.

A slow erosion, however, has been taking place in the foundation of student financial aid. The gap between grants, work study, and loans has widened to a point where it is becoming critical. The disparity is evidenced in the figures below.

PERCENT OF ALL AWARDS

Year	Grants/ workstudy	Loans

We are alarmed at this shift in the grant/loan balance, because we are creating a greater burden on students, a greater threat to their futures, and a long range negative effect on the economy. Loans were not meant to take the place of grant and work study programs. This shift needs to be reevaluated by Congress and action taken to correct this imbalance.

We believe that House Reauthorization of the Higher Education Act of 1965 addresses some of these concerns while expanding present programs at little cost. Current higher education programs cost the federal government $9.2 billion per year. The House bill which reauthorizes student aid and other programs for the next five years will cost less than $10 billion per year. In this context, student aid is a large investment in our nation's future.

We agree with the general direction of the House version of reauthorization. We object, however, to the proposed definition of a self-supporting (independent) student, which excludes needy students below an arbitrarily selected age from being recognized as independent except in unusual circumstances. There is an significant evidence to support the claim that students are abusing this aid provision. Economic conditions experienced by the applicants should be the criteria for eligibility to receive aid as independent student. Federal aid is to be sensitive to need, not age, and must remain so.

Shifting the burden of funding of the College Workstudy Program from the current institution contribution of 20% to 25% in 1989-90 and to 30% in 1990-91 is unacceptable. This will result in higher institutional costs and a lessened incentive to employ students at fair wages. In addition, we oppose payment of sub-minimum wages under any circumstances.

The Next Step: Senate Considerations

The next step in the reauthorization process is the preparation of a bill by the Senate Subcommittee on Education, Arts, and the Humanities. The bill advanced by the House, as stated earlier, provides many features which we believe should be considered in the preparation of the Senate bill.

We therefore propose that the following recommendations be considered by the Senate Subcommittee on Education, Arts, and the Humanities:

Title IV

1. Pell Grants.—Establish the maximum Pell award at $2,300 in academic year 1987-88, $2,500 in 88-89, $2,700 in academic year 89-90, $2,900 in academic 90-91, and $3,100 in academic 91-92. Provide for a minimum award of $200 for all students except in the case of less than half-time students, for whom the minimum award should be $50.

We oppose any attempt to attach an academic requirement in order to qualify for a Pell Grant. We believe that the present monitoring system which allows individual institutions to set standards of academic progress has worked well.

2. Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grants.—Establish the SEOG authorization level at $500 million in FY87 and "such sums" for succeeding fiscal years. Increase the maximum amount of award to $4,000. Require that recipients demonstrate need. Preference will be given to those students with greatest need.

3. State Student Incentive Grant.—Establish the SSIG authorization at $100 million in FY1987 and "such sums" for succeeding fiscal years. Permit funds in excess of FY1985 appropriations to be used for need-based state work/study programs. Increase the maximum award from $2,000 to $3,000.

4. TRIO.—Establish TRIO authorization at $400 million in FY 1987 and "such sums" for succeeding fiscal years. Establish a National Center for Postsecondary Opportunity to insure that adequate information on student aid reaches students, parents, counselors and others. Fund through set aside of $5 million from the Department's operating budget. Permit use of peer counselors in the Student Support Services program.

5. Child Care Services for Economically Disadvantaged Students.—Authorize $15 million in FY 1987 and "such sums" in succeeding fiscal years. Grants will enable institutions of higher education to provide child care services to low-income and first generation college students.

6. Federal, State and Private Student Loan Programs.—Retain the current loan limits of $2,500 for undergraduates in their first two years. Expand to $3,500 loan limits for undergraduates at the junior, senior or equivalent level.

Extend the grace period before repayment from 6 to 9 months.

Phase out the origination fee at the rate of 1% a year. Also discontinue charging a processing fee for GSL's, as contrary to Congressional intent. Require all students to show need to qualify for the GSL program, but retain its structure as an entitlement. Permit guarantee agencies and others to issue consolidation loans to students with debts over $7,500.

7. Work/Study Programs.—Authorize $700 million in FY 1987 and "such sums" in succeeding fiscal years.

Include graduate and professional students in the statement of purposes of the college work/study program.

Provide that if an institution includes part-time students in the determination of their need for part-time students, such students be provided a "reasonable proportion" of such funds.

Permit students who have exhausted their eligibility for college work/study to continue employment in non-work/study jobs at the institution for the remainder of the semester. We further recommend that the Federal Government work through the Small Business Administration to enhance cooperative workstudy and internship programs between colleges and businesses.

8. National Direct Student Loans.—Authorize $300 million in FY 1987 and "such sums" in succeeding fiscal years.

Provide for a priority in making awards to students from families with incomes below the median family income.

Expand loan limits for undergraduate, graduate and preprofessional students.

Extend the deferment period from 6 to 9 months. We would note our opposition to any new provision that authorizes the assessment of "late charges" for the failure of a borrower to pay on time.

9. Single Needs Analysis.—We support the concept of moving to a single need analysis for federal financial aid programs, based primarily on the Uniform Methodology System.

Among other things, such a system should clarify the requirement that students not be charged a fee for applying for federal financial aid, establish a federal financial aid calendar to facilitate an orderly and timely operation of the federal aid system, and has the provision that less-than-half-time students are eligible for assistance under the Title IV programs.

10. Toll-Free Number.—We believe that the now-defunct idea of a national student aid hotline should be revived, and support language that directs the Secretary to develop such a system.

11. Part-time Student Aid.—Part-time students make up one of the fastest growing sectors in postsecondary education. Between 1972 and 1982, part-time student enrollment increased 61% until it accounted for 5 million students, representing 41% of postsecondary and 50% of community and junior college enrollments nationwide. Facing significant financial and personal obligations, part-time students make great sacrifices to attend college. We commend Congressman Biaggi's work on behalf of the part-time student population in financial aid programs in the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act.

12. Loan Deferment.—We strongly support deferment of loan repayment for up to six months for parental leave for borrowers who are interrupting school deferment periods for prenatal or infant care and who are not gainfully employed. We further support deferment for up to five years for all public elementary or secondary school teachers.

Title IX

Students applaud the creation of an aid program for the nation's graduate students. We would suggest, however, that several alterations be made in the current structure of the program:

1. Under the proposed House bill, institutions would compete for graduate aid dollars on the basis of "merit" in terms of their graduate curriculum. Aid money awarded would then be distributed by the institution to the students. Further, aid availability would be restricted to those areas of graduate study that are of "critical need"; that is, they are judged to be priorities in terms of research.

2. While supportive of the general concept of aid to graduate students, we would suggest that a more effective method of distributing the aid dollars would be to provide it to the students directly, rather than filtering it through the institutions. Further, we believe that the availability of aid should not be limited to areas of "critical need", since such determinations will inevitably be arbitrary and transient. Rather, we recommend that student need should be the only criteria in the awarding of aid money.

Title XI

Students recognize the unique role played by the nation's urban universities, and we are supportive of programs designed to strengthen that role. We support cooperative programs among higher educational institutions and urban centers across the country.

CONCLUSION

In an era of declining federal resources, educational funding is especially important because it represents an investment in the future of this nation and contributes to the economic vitality of our country.

The House Postsecondary Education Subcommittee has pointed out that this Reauthorization Bill is a step back from allowing student assistance to middle income citizens, as expressed in the "Middle Income Assistance Act." Access to higher education to disadvantaged students is again perceived as the priority for federal student aid.

The ability of the federal government to provide even minimal levels of access has been eroded by gradual dissipation in national attention. This generation of students and higher education professionals has a mission: Reawaken the sense of egalitarianism that first made possible the Higher Education Act of 1965, to once again encourage a bitter and cynical public that federal spending is not always wasteful and inefficient, but that it can be a force to social good. We must recreate a national consensus that a strong system of higher education, accessible to all, is the litmus test to an advanced society. Finally, we must commit ourselves to the preservation of the federal role in higher education as a measure to the generosity and self-sacrifice of the American people.

Such a task is what the student leaders gathered here have taken upon themselves. There are over six million reasons expressed in the six million students represented here—that will succeed.

LAUNCHING OF THE PLUMA DE ORO WRITERS COMPETITION

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I am indeed honored to have the opportunity to share with my colleagues news of an exciting competition for Spanish language writers that was launched recently at a press conference.

The Pluma De Oro Spanish literary competition will be open to all U.S. citizens and residents, as well as foreign students and exchange scholars who have equal opportunities to contribute to the enrichment of the Spanish language. Funding for the Pluma De Oro competition is being provided by a grant from the American Express Travel Related Services Co., Inc. One hundred leading figures in the worlds of business, politics, academia, media, and publishing as well as the ambassadors of the Spanish-speaking countries are being invited to join a national board or "patronato" of the award program. The board will give directives and establish policy guidelines for the competition. From among that board a jury committee will be selected. That committee will recommend jurors and organize the juries that will read, comment, and select the finalists. Juries will be comprised of Spanish and Latin American authors, academicians, publishers, and critics as well as their U.S. counterparts.

As a fitting prelude to the 1992 celebration of the 500th anniversary of Christopher Columbus' discovery and opening of the New World—Columbus Day, October 12, 1986, will be the final deadline for the submission of manuscripts. The first prizes will be awarded in January 1987. Thereafter, prizes will be awarded in January of every year. Details on how to enter the competition will be forthcoming.

Mr. Speaker, the Pluma De Oro competition, will give the United States, a country of 20 million Spanish-speaking people, recognition as having a place in the shared culture of Spain and Latin America. Given the Spanish language's early and significant role in U.S. culture, the national competition for literary prizes in Spanish will serve as a key unlying link between the two major languages of the hemisphere: English and Spanish.

Increasingly, English-speaking Americans are becoming more familiar with some of the best writers of the Spanish language like Mario Vargas Llosa, Carlos Fuentes, Gabriel Garcia Marquez, Octavio Paz, Julio Cortazar, and others. The competition will highlight the Spanish language's early and significant role in U.S. culture. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to serve as a member of the Pluma De Oro Executive Committee and will be doing all I can to spread the word about the national competition. I would like to commend the American Express Travel Related Services Co., for launching this competition today that will serve to highlight the many outstanding works of Spanish-speaking writers in the United States.

PRIZES FOR SPANISH LITERATURE WRITTEN IN THE UNITED STATES

SUMMARY

A national competition for the best literary works written in the Spanish language in the United States is being established. The competition, the first of its kind, will stimulate literary production in Spanish, and will give the United States, a country of 20 million Spanish-speaking people, recognition as having a place in the shared culture of Spain and Latin America. The project will act as a link among Hispanics in the United States and as a bridge to the English-speaking population which increasingly appreciates Iberoamerican culture. It will also be a prelude to the 1992 celebration of the 500th Anniversary of Christopher Columbus' discovery and opening of the New World.

Funding for the Pluma de Oro competition, including cash awards, is being provided by a grant from the American Express Travel Related Services Company, Inc.

One hundred leading figures in the worlds of business, politics, academia, media and publishing, as well as the Ambassadors of the Spanish-speaking countries are being invited to join the National Board or "Patronato" of the awards program. The board will give directives and establish policy guidelines for the competition.

From among the "Patronato" a Jury Committee will be selected. This committee will recommend jurors and organize the juries that will read, comment and select the finalists. Juries will be comprised of Spanish and Latin American authors, academicians, publishers and critics as well as their U.S. counterparts.

Columbus Day (October 12, 1986) will be the final deadline for the submission of manuscripts. The first prizes will be awarded in January of 1987. Thereafter, prizes will be awarded in January of every year.

THE SPANISH LANGUAGE: AN INTERNATIONAL ASSET OF THE UNITED STATES

Rewarding the literary craft is a cultural tradition that began with the Greeks. In the United States, there are several well-funded literary prizes for English productions, but only a few locally-organized prizes for works written in Spanish. Thus, writers of the Spanish language in the United States who want to be recognized may become discouraged to use their language.

Since Columbus brought the Spanish language to the Western Hemisphere in 1492, it has become one of the most precious elements of the diverse cultural heritage of the United States.

As an official language in the United Nations for decades, and now, with the entry of Spain into the European Economic Community, Spanish has enhanced its status as a major international language.

Increasingly, English-speaking Americans are becoming more familiar with some of the best writers of the Spanish language like Mario Vargas Llosa, Carlos Fuentes, Gabriel Garcia Marquez, Octavio Paz, Julio Cortazar and others.

Spanish is the language with the largest enrollment in U.S. colleges, having taken the historical lead from French more than a decade ago. In fact, a majority of the academic journals dedicated to Spanish and Latin American letters are published in the United States. Furthermore, every major U.S. university has at least one world-class scholar whose expertise covers the most important aspects of spanish and Latin American literature. Over fifty percent of the master's and Ph.D. theses and dissertations on Latin American, Spanish literature and linguistics are produced by U.S. academics.

This rich reality is part of what we will be celebrating in 1992, five hundred years after Queen Isabella's ships brought the Spanish language to America.

HISPANICS IN THE UNITED STATES

"Hispanic" is a general term used in the United States to describe a group of people who share a common language and culture. Perhaps the most dramatic characteristic of the U.S. Hispanic population is that they are on the way to becoming the largest "minority" in this country. In fact, if the U.S. Hispanic population were to be counted as a "separate country," it would be the fifth largest "country" in the complex of nations that speak Spanish.

The group, however, is far from homogeneous. The term itself is, at times, misleading, for it includes peoples from 20 different countries around the world—countries which are unique in themselves.

The Spanish language, more than any other cultural trait, has served and continues to serve as the key unifying link among this group, as well as the link among Spanish-speaking countries.

LITERARY PRIZES

Given the Spanish language's early and significant role in U.S. culture, the idea of a national competition for literary prizes in Spanish would seem to be in order. Among the immediate and long term consequences of this project are the following:

1. It will, through the prizes, be a fitting match for the prestigious literary prizes awarded annually in Spanish-speaking countries, mainly Spain, and will draw national attention to the need to use the language elegantly and effectively.

2. It will show the rest of the nation that the leaders of the U.S. Hispanic population care for and are willing to support the humanities and cultivate the arts.

3. It will increase the interest of major corporations and businesses catering to the needs of Hispanics in supporting this unique enterprise. Spanish newpapers, radio stations and television networks will be natural backers of the project.

4. It will increase the self-esteem of future teachers, translators, business people and diplomats. Hispanics will realize that the elegant use of the Spanish language is recognized and rewarded.

5. It will constitute a solid link between the two major languages of the hemisphere, English and Spanish, by acting as a diplomatic bridge toward Latin America. In a sense, then, the prizes will be an investment in better political relations with Latin America and Spain, showing that the United States is willing to nurture and develop this gift received from the Spanish-speaking nations.

6. It will draw the immediate interest of Spanish and Latin American publishers and writers to enter aggressively into a market that in the past has been only indirectly cultivated. Publishers will now have the option of publishing U.S.-produced works in the Spanish language with the expectation of sales matching the traditional prize-winning books.

DISTINCTIVE CHARACTERISTICS

The Pluma de Oro Spanish Literary Prizes will be governed by a prestigious National Board or "Patronato". Within the Board there will be two committees:

1. An Executive Committee which will guide and supervise the normal operations of the competition in accordance with the broader policy guidelines set by the Board as a whole.

2. A Jury Committee which will recommend names for the jury pool from which jurors will be selected. For each of the prize categories, a jury will read, comment and select the candidates' final manuscripts. Each jury will be composed of at least four members: possibly one writer, one academician, one editor and one critic or journalist. The exact guidelines for juries will be set by the Board.

The Board will give directives to the North-South Center of the University of Miami, which will act as Executive Secretariat of the project by supplying staff, academic resources, meeting places and communication links. In addition to the two committees of the Board, an International Honorary Board of renowned writers will guide the Executive Secretariat. The Secretariat will be chaired by the Dean of the Graduate School of International Studies and Director of the North-South Center.

Prizes will be awarded in the following five categories: Novel, Short Story, Drama, Poetry, and Essay. In each category, there will be two different levels: general prizes and student prizes. The general prizes are endowed with a minimum cash prize of $2,000, while student prizes are endowed with $500. It is hoped that the works of the winners will be published and/or produced, within a year, as previously established through agreements with publishing houses, theatre companies and other institutions.

The competition is open to all United States citizens and residents, as well as foreign students and exchange scholars who will have equal opportunities to contribute to the enrichment of the Spanish language.

NEWPORT NEWS SHIPBUILDING CENTENNIAL

HON. G. WILLIAM WHITEHURST

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, January 18, 1986, Senator JOHN WARNER addressed the audience gathered at Newport News Shipbuilding to celebrate the centennial of the founding of that great shipyard.

As a former Secretary of the Navy and a present senior member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, the Senator is uniquely qualified to discuss the challenges and opportunities facing both Newport News Shipbuilding and the U.S. Navy. His statement was both eloquent and thought-provoking, and I am pleased to share it with my colleagues.

I hope that Senator WARNER'S words will receive the careful consideration they deserve.

REMARKS OF SENATOR JOHN WARNER

It's always a thrill for me to visit this magnificent shipyard where so much of our nation's maritime history rests. Today, of course, I am particularly excited to be here to participate in these Centennial observances.

I've visited this yard many times and had the honor of participating in many naval vessel ceremonies. Always I think of successive generations of families who have produced many of the finest craftsmen to be found anywhere in the world. I think of those traditions of excellence that have been passed from grandfather to father and from father to son.

Ladies and gentlemen, the U.S. is a nation bordered by two great oceans. Our first line of defense is forward deployment. Therefore, keeping the sea lanes of communication open is essential to our survival. Only with the ships you build is this possible.

One hundred years is a long time.

If you think about it for a moment, this shipyard came into being the same year that the Statue of Liberty was dedicated. But unlike the Statue of Liberty, which is presently being remodeled—you would say "overhauled"—Newport News Shipbuilding has maintained a high level of modernization.

It's not easy for any institution to last 100 years. It takes exceptional management, exceptional craftsmen working as a team with a strong sense of dedication. This is what is responsible for the many successes Newport News Shipyard has earned in its first 100 years. And it's against this background of success that this yard is in a good position to successfully face the challenges ahead for another 100 years. Challenges to the nation's defense, challenges to Virginia's economy.

The partnership between Newport News Shipyard and the Commonwealth of Virginia is an extraordinary success story. First, this yard is, by far, the largest private employer in the state. Second, in 1985, this yard issued 47,700 purchase orders totalling $1.8 billion to 12,255 Virginia suppliers, which means employment throughout the state. Third, the defense work performed in this yard, combined with the work done by other defense contractors throughout the state, is the primary reason why Virginia is now Number One.

By that I mean Virginia is the nation's largest recipient of defense dollars on a per capita basis. That works out to $2,170 for every Virginian. Yes, that is good news, and many here today can take justified pride. Indeed, we owe a great debt of gratitude to the generations who preceded us, for this first place took a long time to achieve.

Virginians historically have been among the first to fight for freedom. But with this position of being Number One goes the responsibility of maintaining the highest standards of excellence in every respect of defense work. If we are to remain Number One in dollars, we must be in the eyes of the nation:

Number One in the quality of craftsmanship.

Number One in efficiency and cost savings, and eliminate waste for the American taxpayer.

Number One in honesty and integrity at every level of defense contracting.

A very special burden falls upon this yard, for you are the biggest, and there is no better. So you are the standard bearer for all Virginia defense contractors. As goes Newport News Shipyard, so goes the reputation of defense contracting in Virginia!

Like a fine wine whose taste improves with age, Newport News Shipyard is building better ships than ever and, I'm confident, will continue to do so for at least another 100 years.

In this audience today are descendants of persons from all ranks and levels of authority who have guided this yard. Many of you come from families who have worked in this yard for generations, carrying on that tradition of handing down valuable skills from one generation to the next.

Never can we lose sight of the fact that these huge machines and cranes that are scattered throughout this yard are operated by people. And never can we lose sight of the fact that talented people are responsible for the good, sound management practices that have led to the successes this yard has enjoyed since 1886.

So, I think it's only appropriate that we recognize each of these fine people who are with us today, as well as those who have gone before them, who have invested of their time and talents and meant so much to this community and to our nation. I ask you to join me in recognizing the past and present employees of Newport News Shipbuilding.

We thank you!

Ladies and gentlemen, in this changing world, America's will to remain strong is being challenged in new ways. We seek a more peaceful world through a lessening of tensions with the Soviet Union in broad areas of security issues. Hopefully during the forthcoming two summit sessions positive results will be reached.

But during this same period we must strengthen our preparations to deter the astounding rise in terrorism—a rear guard threat of rising consequence.

We have only to look at the events of the past few months to appreciate how grave this situation has become. Events such as the Achille Lauro hijacking, the Egyptair hijacking and, of course, the senseless killing of 16 persons at the Rome and Vienna airports all underscore the threat each of us faces at the hands of terrorists. If anything, these recent episodes of terrorism clearly say something else—and that is that terrorists are engaging in a pattern of increasing senseless brutality. Each new act appears to be more sensational and grim than the one before and the victims can be anyone from a wheelchair-bound cruise line passenger to an 11-year-old girl.

Our military, in training and in new missions for existing equipment, are preparing to deter this new threat and meet it with force when required.

The carrier, like those that are built in this yard, is being given a vital role in this important mission. In the increasingly hostile and politically uncertain environment of the Middle East, South America and parts of the third world, the U.S. cannot be assured of obtaining or continuing lasting land rights for military air bases.

In recent years, the United States has lost access to a number of air bases around the globe. We can no longer use the Wheelis air base in Libya. We can no longer use four air bases in Iran. We can no longer use four air bases in Morocco, two of which were SAC bases. We can no longer use three air bases in Greece. And now, with the tragic increase in terrorism, even the existing bases have increased problems of security.

Carriers must make up for these losses, actual and contingent. The ability of these carriers to provide forward mobile basing of American air power near crisis locations is unequaled. We witnessed the importance of our carriers in the capture of the hijackers who seized the Achille Lauro. The four F-14s and E-2C command and control aircraft that carried out that daring mission with less than two hours notice came from the only airfield we could be certain of in the region—the deck of a U.S. aircraft carrier—the Saratoga.

When you cut through all of the arguments, the irrefutable evidence remains that big carriers provide air cover that is an essential element to our forward deployed strategy—terrorism included.

Now our attention, our need to prepare, turns to the future.

Ladies and gentlemen, when the Theodore Roosevelt, the Abraham Lincoln, and the George Washington leave this yard to join the fleet, twelve of the fifteen carriers in the 600-ship Navy will have been built by Newport News Shipyard, including all seven of our nuclear-powered carriers. The Navy has now reached the point where it must make a major decision about the future of our first nuclear-powered carrier, the Enterprise.

The Enterprise is 25 years old and in need of modernization to bring its propulsion and warfighting systems up to date. Soon the Congress will have to review a decision to be made by the Secretary of the Navy. There are but two options: The Enterprise should either be entered into a service life extension program or be mothballed and replaced with a new aircraft carrier. To extend the life of Enterprise will be extraordinarily expensive; indeed, my research reveals it may cost nearly as much as a new ship. At present, it's my judgment that we should not restore the Enterprise. Rather we should build a new nuclear-powered carrier. Further, we should consider a package of two new carriers using the very successful formula of multi-year procurement. A second ship is needed to replace the aging carrier Midway around the year 2000.

I commit to you to do my part, not just because these contracts come to Virginia, but because these ships are essential for our defense.

I have conveyed these views to key people within the Administration, most specifically the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of the Navy. And I am confident that the Administration will, after weighing all the facts, agree with my judgment, and that we will see such a proposal from the Navy shortly.

With such an important decision pending, there is a heavy burden on each person in this yard to continue building on the excellent reputation you have earned in these first 100 years. Further, I close with an old Navy message.

"Attention. All hands on deck!"

Should we win these new contracts, which are needed for America's defense, we will have to muster the next generation of sons and daughters of those present today to carry on our work.

Congratulations to all of you. Thank you.

EXECUTIVE ORDER 11246, PRESIDENT REAGAN SHOULD NOT WEAKEN ENFORCEMENT OF AFFIRMATIVE ACTION PROGRAMS FOR FEDERAL CONTRACTORS

HON. CHARLES A. HAYES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I want to draw the attention of my colleagues to a recent article which appeared in the Washington Post on Thursday, January 23, 1986, by Bill Peterson, a staff writer for the Washington Post. The article, "GOP Mayor Hits Plan to Relax Hiring Rules," eloquently expresses reasons why William H. Hudnut, III, the Republican mayor of Indianapolis, believes the Reagan administration's efforts to weaken Executive Order 11246, "is a political mistake as well as being morally and legally wrong."

The corporate community strongly supports the continued, vigorous, enforcement of Executive Order 11246 and affirmative action goals and timetables. The meaningful participation of minorities and women in the workplace has greatly improved and will continue to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I believe you and the rest of my colleagues will find this article informative and very helpful in understanding why the Executive order should be preserved in its present form.

GOP MAYOR HITS PLAN TO RELAX HIRING RULES

(By Bill Peterson)

William H. Hudnut III, the Republican mayor of Indianapolis, yesterday said an effort by the Justice Department to scale back major affirmative action directives "is a political mistake as well as being morally and legally wrong."

Hudnut said he had written a letter to President Reagan complaining about the efforts because he thought the president "hasn't been briefed well [on the issue] by the people in the injustice department."

The letter said efforts to modify or eliminate a 20-year-old presidential executive order requiring affirmative action in hiring represents "an unfortunate step backward" and would turn "the clock far back on civil rights advances."

These efforts are supported by Attorney General Edwin Meese III and William Bradford Reynolds, the department's civil rights chief. The department has attempted to halt the use of racial hiring goals, supported by Hudnut, in an affirmative action case involving the Indianapolis police and fire departments.

Such action "sends the wrong message politically" to minorities and could damage the Republican Party, Hudnut told a news conference at the annual winter meeting of the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

Two other mayors, Donna Owens (R) of Toledo, Ohio, and Thirman L. Milner (D) of Hartford, Conn., appeared with Hudnut at the news conference and endorsed his stand.

"We haven't reached that goal in the country where we can say, 'Hallelujah. There is no discrimination,' " said Owens.

DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., BUST DEDICATION CEREMONY

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

Tuesday, January 21, 1986

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, on January 16, 1986, a very important ceremony took place in the Capitol. On that day a bust of the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., was dedicated and placed in the Capitol rotunda, where it will remain on display for a period of 1 year, after which it will be moved to a permanent location in the Capitol. This ceremony was all the more moving because it coincided with the many events marking the observance of our first national holiday honoring Dr. King.

Black Americans have made countless contributions to the cultural and political development of this Nation. Yet until the placement of Dr. King's bust, not one of the many busts or statues in the Capitol depicted a black American. Though this was long overdue, I can think of no more fitting person to be the first black American honored in the Capitol than Martin Luther King.

The Capitol is our Nation's most important building. It is a symbol of our commitment to the ideals of freedom, justice and equality which are the foundation of our Republic. A memorial to Dr. King rightly belongs there—for no one in American history has better served the principles of our Nation than Dr. King. He lived for them, he fought for them, and he died for them.

Indeed, this bust of Dr. King will be more than just a memorial to a great American. It will serve as a constant reminder to the millions of American citizens and foreign visitors who tour the Capitol that our Nation remains dedicated to the full promise of American life that Dr. King so courageously championed.

Time and again during his lifetime, Dr. King would inspire us with his dream for America. He did it with passion and eloquence, knowing that the rightness of his dream was rooted in the better nature of his countrymen. His dream was an appeal to the conscience and reason of his fellow citizens. It drew from his firm belief that nonviolent social change can conquer the forces of injustice and oppression. And his message was profound in its simplicity: harmony would shame bigotry, justice would outlast its enemies, and true democracy would prevail.

Martin Luther King knew the dangers of complacency. As he wrote from his cell in the Birmingham jail in 1963, "Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere." It was for good reason that he called himself a drum major for justice. His commitment was real.

What I said to the Southern Christian Leadership Conference 11 years ago remains true today: "They shot down the man—and they snuffed out his life—and the man died. But they could not shoot down his dream. For his dream was stronger than life and more powerful than death. And the dream lives on."

Like many Americans, I sorely miss his voice, his inspired leadership, and his courage. But his contributions have taken on a life of their own.

So I am gratified that with the ceremony placing Dr. King's bust in the Capitol, the man and his dream will be memorialized for years to come in the building that represents the center of our Government. It will serve as a message to us all.

HONORING DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 21, 1986

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, it is a great honor for me to rise today and join in this tribute to the memory of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.; a man who changed the history of our Nation with four simple words: "I have a dream."

Yesterday marked the culmination of a 15-year effort to give appropriate recognition to Dr. King and his work by having a national holiday observed on his birthday. I am proud to say that I have been a strong supporter of legislation to establish this well deserved memorial to Dr. King's outstanding contributions and accomplishments.

Martin Luther King, Jr., would have celebrated his 57th birthday this year had he not been slain by a cowardly assassin. During his short life, Dr. King helped bring about enormous social changes that made America a better place for us all to live. And through his efforts to achieve equal treatment for all Americans, Martin Luther King, Jr., remained devoted to nonviolent means of achieving his goals and he inspired thousands of others to conform to his principles of nonviolence.

Through his nonviolent resistance and passionate oratory, Dr. King was able to elevate the struggle for civil rights to the forefront it deserved on the national agenda. From Montgomery, AL, to the jails of Birmingham, his spirit turned violence, bitterness, and alienation into constructive social change.

Martin Luther King, Jr.'s basic doctrine was eloquently given during a speech made at a bus boycott in Montgomery, AL:

If you will protect courageously, and yet with dignity and Christian love, when history books are written in future generations, the historians will have to pause and say, "There lived a great people—a black people—who injected new meaning and dignity into the veins of civilization." This is our challenge and our overwhelming responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, few men have advanced the cause of justice and affected such deeply rooted changes in our society as Dr. King did. Blessed with inordinate courage and commitment, he liberated the oppressed and pulled them from the abyss of despair and frustration.

For generations to come his birthday will serve as a day when all Americans, regardless of race or creed, can pause to reflect on the life, work, and dreams of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and the great principles of freedom, equality, and civil rights that he so nobly espoused.

HON. MICHAEL A. ANDREWS

OF TEXAS

Tuesday, January 21, 1986

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, our Nation celebrated the first observance of our newest national holiday, a holiday honoring the memory of Martin Luther King, Jr. I rise today to pay tribute to Dr. King and to praise those who keep his dream of equality and brotherhood alive.

When we, in Congress, passed the resolution creating Martin Luther King Day last year, many of us spoke of Dr. King's life-long struggle for human rights. We spoke of his many awards, his receipt of the Nobel Peace Prize, his commitment to nonviolence, and his leadership of the civil rights movement.

Above all, we, in Congress, remembered Martin Luther KIng's vision—his dream of what America could and should be. Throughout his life, Dr. King maintained an unwavering faith in America's promise of equality and freedom. Indeed, his greatest victory was the rekindling of our Nation's commitment to the creed embodied in the Constitution: That all men are created equal, endowed by their Creator with the same inalienable rights.

It was this faith Martin Luther King had in America, this dream of brotherhood, that supporters of his holiday seek to keep alive. If Monday's celebration was an important signal of progress, it was also a recognition that the struggle must go on as long as there is any bias, any hatred, any inequality in our great Nation. "Injustice anywhere," Martin Luther King said, is a threat to justice everywhere." And so we, who honor his memory, must also pledge to uphold his ideals.

As we look toward the future, as we continue our work to keep America's promise of freedom bright and Martin Luther King's dream alive, let us use our newest national holiday as a time to chart our progress. Working together for peace and justice as Dr. King did, we cannot fail.

MIKULSKI INTRODUCES MARITIME ECONOMIC AGENDA FOR 1986

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, many Members of the House who represent coastal cities like my own Port of Baltimore are aware of the many problems facing our Nation's ports and the U.S. maritime industry.

Since 1981, over 18,000 American seafarers have lost their jobs, a decline in that industry of almost 40 percent. In addition, longshoreman manhours and work for small maritime businesses have declined in many ports.

Because of these problems faced by our U.S. merchant marine, I am today introducing the "Maritime Economic Agenda for 1986." These three bills are initiatives which address familiar maritime problems in new, and what I believe, are more workable ways. If enacted, I believe they will create new jobs for seafarers, longshoremen, carriers and small business by promoting economic growth and opportunity within the maritime industry.

I. THE CROSS-BORDER COOPERATION ACT OF 1986

The Shipping Act of 1984 revises the Shipping Act of 1916 to provide an updated, simplified, more efficient, responsive, and effective regulatory framework for international liner shipping. The principal goal of this framework is is to develop and maintain an efficient and flexible ocean transportation system through commercial means, with minimum Government involvement.

One area where the benefits of the Shipping Act are not now enjoyed, however, is in the cross-border trade. As it is now written, the Shipping Act does not allow agreements between carriers directly serving U.S. commerce through U.S. ports and those that serve that commerce by moving cargo through ports in an adjacent country. This loophole in our shipping laws is unique. Virtually all over shipping systems in the world extend the conference system to cover commerce between the host nation and a third country which moves through a country adjacent to the host nation.

What have been the effects of this loophole? First, a significant amount of cargo that should normally move through U.S. ports now moves through Canadian ports. Second, the absence of clear legal authority to form cross-border agreements has led to a deteriorating situation where unbridled, cut-throat competition could threaten the stability of our ocean transportation system, adversely affecting carriers, shippers, and ultimately consumers. And finally, and perhaps most significantly, carriers moving cargo directly through U.S. ports and those moving goods through ports in adjacent countries have been unable to take full advantage of the framework set forth in the 1984 Shipping Act.

In the past, legislation introduced to address this problem has directed at correcting the so-called "Canadian diversion" problem. These bills focused on the need for U.S. Government regulation of carriers serving U.S. commerce by moving cargo through Canadian ports. In a sense, by focusing on how Government could solve the problem, they directed too much attention away from the Shipping Act of 1984's goal of reducing Government involvement, while increasing the efficiency of our ocean transportation system.

The bill I am introducing today, however, the Cross-Border Cooperation Act of 1986, offers us a chance to make a dramatic break with past approaches to the cross-border loophole in the Shipping Act. It recasts a solution to this problem not in terms of Government regulation, but commercial cooperation. It replaces the idea of confrontation with the notion of conciliation.

How does the Cross-Border Cooperation Act do this?

First, it would create a new category of carrier, called "contiguous carriers," under the Shipping Act of 1984. These carriers would be defined "as persons providing water transportation of passengers or cargo between the United States and a foreign country for compensation; and who use for all or part of that transportation a vessel operating between a port in a nation contiguous with the United States and a port in a foreign country other than that contiguous nation."

Second, it would allow a contiguous carrier, if he chooses, to form the kind of cooperative agreements currently permitted under section 4 of the Shipping Act with carriers serving U.S. ports.

By allowing the formation of these cross-border agreements, the bill does not seek to correct any imbalance in cross-border rate structures through Government regulation. Instead, it attempts to allow the private sector, namely carriers serving U.S. commerce through United States and Canadian ports, to come together and resolve their differences-within the context of a business agreement.

This approach is in keeping with the spirit and intent of the Shipping Act of 1984, while refining U.S. shipping laws to put them on a par with virtually every other nation's in the world.

II. THE MARITIME SERVICES FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY ACT OF 1986

The second bill I am introducing is similar to legislation introduced in the two previous Congresses designed to allow many small maritime service businesses to collect on bad debts left them by foreign-owned steamship lines.

Prior to 1976, these small businesses had recourse when foreign steamship owners failed to pay their bills. They could simply file suit and U.S. marshals would seize the vessel until the courts could determine the outcome of the claim. With the passage of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act in 1976, however, suits against vessels owned or operated by a foreign government are prohibited. The result, small maritime businesses, including stevedores, marine terminal operators, port authorities, freight forwarders, drayage firms and harbor pilots, are left holding the bag.

A 1983 survey by the National Association of Stevedores put the average bad debt per stevedoring firm at $373,000. Reports from small businessmen in my own Port of Baltimore indicate that the level of this problem is continuing, and in far too many instances, is increasing. And it is not a big waterfront corporations that are forced to absorb these losses, but many family-owned firms that already operate on thin profit margins.

The Maritime Services Financial Responsibility Act of 1986 would correct this abuse by requiring the owners of foreign vessel who are in the foreign trade and use U.S. ports to obtain a certificate of financial responsibility to meet claims for maritime services. The financial responsibility required under this certificate would be equal to $100 per ton of the vessel or $1 million, whichever is less.

Failure to comply with the financial responsibility terms of the act would result in fines up to $10,000 and may be subject to appropriate sanctions, including refusing departure clearance and/or access to other U.S. ports.

The bill I am introducing today makes one significant change from those measures introduced in past Congresses: it applies only to foreign vessels engaged in foreign commerce that call on ports in the United States. It does not apply to U.S. vessels engaged in the foreign commerce. This change will focus the bill's purpose, greater accountability on the part of vessel owners who refuse to pay their dockside bills, on those parties who are responsible for the problem faced by many maritime small businesses: foreign-owned steamship lines.

III. CUSTOMS AUTOMATION ACT OF 1986

The third part of the maritime package I am introducing today is the "Customs Automation Act of 1986." It is designed to aid ports in developing automated cargo processing facilities that will provide them with greatly increased capacity and efficiency to process cargo as it is loaded and unloaded at the docks.

The bill would accomplish this by earmarking 1 percent of the collected customs duties at each particular port to be returned to that port's administering authority to develop automated cargo processing facilities. Funds would be available subject to annual appropriations.

As many of my colleagues know, the U.S. Customs Service has faced sharp budget and personnel reductions in recent years that have hampered both the speed and efficiency of cargo processing at many of the Nation's ports. In many instances, manual processing of cargo only compounds this reduction in Customs personnel.

To combat these reductions and to improve the commercial performance at our Nation's ports, the Customs Service has begun to develop an automated commercial system [ACS]. The ACS is an electronically-operated cargo processing system which would enable each port to have Customs clear cargo for delivery by computer.

Funds authorized by this legislation would be designed to help U.S. ports finance the construction of the necessary facilities to participate in the ACS Program.

The establishment of a cost-sharing program between ports and Federal Government for Customs automation is both essential and cost-effective. There have been significantly increased demands on cargo processing at U.S. ports over the last decade. This fact, combined with the fiscal restraints all levels of Government face, has placed enormous strains on existing cargo processing facilities and Customs personnel. Neither the Federal Government, nor State and local governments, can afford this cargo processing overhaul by themselves.

The cooperative partnership between the Federal Government and the States which this bill would establish would not only improve the efficiency of American ports, and increase the amount of cargo they process, but generate more Customs revenues for the U.S. Treasury.

Mr. Speaker, this bill has its roots in legislation I introduced in the 97th Congress which would have established a similar "Customs Revenue Sharing Program." This legislation, however, makes several key changes embodied in that earlier measure.

First, funds authorized under this act could be used solely for a port to automate its Customs processing. As a result, the purpose of the Federal-State partnership is clearly defined and much more efficient and specific in its use of Federal funds. Second, the bill does not create an open-ended entitlement for local ports. Instead, once a port completes its automated cargo processing facilities and brings its system on line, they would no longer be able to draw upon Federal revenues.

These modifications to the previous legislation demonstrate the need for fiscal responsibility in these difficult budgetary times we face. Yet at the same time this initiative seeks to achieve a goal that each Member of the House ought to support, making our Nation's ports and maritime industry more competitive, and able to enjoy the benefits of new ideas and new technologies.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to seriously consider each of the measures I am introducing today. They are designed to increase the stability and competitiveness of our domestic maritime industry, providing more jobs for small businesses, longshoremen and seafarers. In short, they are an important beginning to help create a framework for new opportunities for the U.S. merchant marine.

THE BINGHAM FAMILY EMPIRE SELF-DESTRUCTS

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I indicated that on January 10, 1986, it was announced first in the Courier-Journal, a Louisville, KY, daily newspaper, that the family of Barry Bingham, Sr., would be selling the media empire the Bingham family had accumulated during the past three generations. Typical of the one-sided news coverage of the giant Bingham media, the reporters for the Bingham media have quoted a few Kentucky leaders expressing their dismay at the decision by Barry Bingham, Sr., to sell the Courier-Journal, the Louisville Times, WHAS Radio, WHAS-TV, and the Standard Gravure, the printing company.

What the Bingham media empire will never reveal is that there are tens of thousands of Kentuckians who are overjoyed with the news that the Bingham family will soon no longer control the news in Kentucky. Even the Associated Press headquarters in Kentucky is located on the fourth floor of the Courier-Journal and Louisville Times building in downtown Louisville and is adjacent to the newsrooms of these two newspapers.

There is only one reporter for the Louisville newspapers who resides in the western half of Kentucky. Tim Roberts, who leases a small apartment in Madisonville, KY, has a telephone which serves as the "west Kentucky bureau." I emphasize Mr. Roberts is the only reporter for the Louisville newspapers who lives west of Louisville, and he moved there just last year. Even western Kentucky population centers such as Bowling Green, Owensboro, Paducah, Henderson, and Hopkinsville do not have a Courier-Journal or Louisville Times office or bureau.

In listing the bureaus of the Bingham empire the reporters understandably don't show their locations on a map of Kentucky because such would be a stark reminder that the Louisville newpapers' bureaus outside Louisville in Frankfort, Lexington, Bardstown, Somerset, and Hazard indicate the interest of the newspapers is in Louisville, central Kentucky and eastern Kentucky.

The following is a portion of the lengthy news article written by Alex S. Jones, headlined "The Fall of the House of Bingham," which appeared in the New York Times last Sunday, January 19.

THE FALL OF THE HOUSE OF BINGHAM

(By Alex S. Jones)

LOUISVILLE, KY.—Sallie, now a determined feminist, emerged as a chief protagonist in the saga. Her resistance to Barry Jr.'s decision to remove her from the boards of the family businesses set in motion what became the final crisis.

At the end, even Eleanor, the younger and more conventional sister, who had tried to maintain her family ties, opposed her brother—as implacable in her way as the others.

Now that the decision to sell has been made, a number of media companies are competing to buy the Bingham properties—The Courier-Journal and Louisville Times Company, WHAS Inc., which includes a television station and two radio stations, and Standard Gravure, a commercial printing operation. They are expected to bring about $400 million, with the families of each of Barry Sr.'s children likely to receive about $40 million (See box).

But the family peace that Barry Bingham Sr. and his wife, Mary, hoped for seems far, far away.

THE HISTORY

"Scale the characters down, and it's definitely Faulknerian," said Robert Bingham, the 19-year-old grandson of Barry Sr., comparing his family to the tortured Mississippi delta families of William Faulkner's novels.

Just as Faulkner's fictional characters plumb the past seeking explanations for the pain of the present, the Binghams tend to look far back to pick up the threads of their undoing.

The Binghams, like the Kennedys, started poor, certainly in comparison with their present great wealth. Barry Sr.'s great-great-grandfather, a Scotch-Irish immigrant founded the Bingham School, a secondary school, in North Carolina shortly after the American Revolution. Barry Sr.'s great-grandfather was also a teacher; so was his grandfather, Robert Bingham, a Confederate soldier, who returned to North Carolina after the Civil War and worked at educating freed slaves.

But Robert's son, Robert Worth Bingham, became a lawyer and moved to Louisville in 1896, at the age of 25, eventually becoming the city's mayor and a circuit court judge. He lost his first wife in 1913 when a car in which she was riding was hit by a train. Barry Sr. was seven years old when his mother died; his brother and sister not much older.

Three years later, Judge Bingham, as he was then and forever after known, married Mary Kenan Flagler, the widow of an oil tycoon with a $100 million estate. Judge Bingham signed a pre-nuptial agreement stating that, upon her death, he would receive $5 million from her estate. As Barry Sr. tells the story in a memo to his children, Judge Bingham insisted on the pre-nuptial agreement, even though without it he would have been entitled to half his wife's fortune.

Eight months after their wedding, the new Mrs. Bingham died, apparently of cardiac arrest. But her brothers accused Judge Bingham and her doctors of conspiring to poison her and the body was exhumed. An autopsy revealed that the cause of death was, indeed, cardiac arrest, and her brothers dropped the charges.

In 1918, Judge Bingham bought, for $1 million, a majority interest in The Courier-Journal and The Times, which even then were Kentucky's premier newspapers. He also acquired a 40-acre estate overlooking the Ohio River, a few miles outside Louisville, and on it a huge red-brick Georgian mansion where Barry Jr. now lives. Judge Bingham christened the estate "Melcombe," after an estate in Dorset, England, where Binghams had lived since the 12th century. The judge had another house built on the estate, which, though generous, was smaller than the mansion and came to be called the "Little House." Barry Sr. and his wife Mary live there today.

The judge was an ardent Democrat and a supporter of the League of Nations, and his newspapers reflected his views. In the 1930's, he backed the New Deal and President Roosevelt rewarded him in 1933 with the ambassadorship to the Court of St. James. Judge Bingham died in London in 1937 and the next ambassador was Joseph Kennedy.

By then, Judge Bingham's younger son, Barry Sr., a magna cum laude graduate of Harvard, was deeply immersed in the family business, which had grown to include WHAS Inc.—then an AM radio station—and Standard Gravue. He alone had moved back to Louisville; his brother and sister spent most of their lives in England and Barry Sr. soon bought them out.

He was 32 years old when his father died, a handsome, garrulous and charming man with a cello voice, and he had married Mary Clifford Caperton, a Richmond girl whom he met while he was at Harvard and she at Radcliffe. The two are very close. Barry Sr. says that he decided to sell the family companies now rather than later so that he and his wife, who is 81 years old, could face the ordeal together. "It would have been almost impossible alone," he says.

In fact, Barry Sr. says that his successful marriage and the extremely close relationship with his wife somehow contributed to what he says was his clear failure to communicate effectively with his children.

Under Barry Sr., known simply as "Senior" to his employees, the family business flourished as Louisville boomed with new industry in the post-war years and Kentucky prospered as a coal mining and tobacco center. But the Courier-Journal and The Times, in the Southern liberal political tradition, frequently supported positions that put the papers in conflict with their more conservative readers. In their columns, labor unions found strong support and strip miners were blasted for not restoring the land.

But it was the strong stand in favor of civil rights that drew the most controversy. Barry Sr. says that one of his proudest accomplishments was the Louisville had the South's first integrated school system, a victory won largely without violence—but at a price.

"I came to Louisville in 1964," said Mr. Janensch, the papers' executive editor, "and Senior was not a beloved figure then. The Binghams were considered the liberal elite. The papers were despised as Communist. And the image of the Binghams was that they were not at all concerned with common people. Patronizing." It was only in recent years that Barry Sr. emerged in Lousville as a popular elder statesman.

THE CHILDREN

For his children, life was very easy. The Binghams, Sallie recalls, had five servants, including a particularly beloved nurse called Nursie by Sallie and her two older brothers, Worth and Barry Jr.

"There was no other family like it," says Sallie, who adds that she remembers a family sense of being liberals under attack; of being somehow "much better looking" than other people, and of being free of the burden of "time wasted on petty boring details." These were handled by the servants and company managers. It was a family, Sallie says, in which the highest priority was placed on an absence of friction and conflict, where troublesome details of day-to-day living simply were taken care of "like magic."

She now blames what she calls the family's "smoothness" for producing a generation of children who did not have to depend on each other, and, in the case of Sallie, Barry, Jr., and the youngest child, Eleanor, never created the close ties that often come with the give-and-take of childhood.

"We all seem to have some inhibitions about each other; it's very hard to express to each other the way we feel sometimes," Barry Sr. says, somewhat ruefully. The Binghams, he says, might have been "much better off if we'd been a more Latin-type family with a lot of outbursts, tears, screams and reconciliations. But that has not been the way any of us operates."

The first-born of this special family was Robert Worth Bingham 3d, as handsome and garrulous as his father and clearly heir to the top spot in the family kingdom. Barry Sr. describes Worth, who was born in 1932, as a natural athlete, a natural newspaperman, a natural leader who loved mixing with politicians and other powerful figures.

He was also a reckless, profane and overbearing personality, according to Sallie and others who were close to him. He loved to take risks, as though the family's seamless lifestyle had cheated him of being tested. As a young man he delighted in fast driving and in trips to Las Vegas, where his losses sometimes forced him to make urgent calls to the non-family executives who managed the Bingham holdings, asking them to replenish his bank account and not tell his parents. He was one of the Louisville businessmen who originally syndicated Muhammad Ali, then a young Louisville boxer named Cassius Clay.

Worth's younger brother by 16 months was Barry Jr., a very different, less daredevil personality. Barry Sr. remembers his second son as having been "a merry little boy," thoroughly devoted to his older brother, as Barry Jr. himself confirms. Despite Barry Jr.'s near adoration, Worth teased his brother relentlessly. For instance, Barry Jr. was overweight until he went to college, and Worth delighted in introducing him as "Belly," rather than Barry.

Even so, Barry Jr. says that he was quite content to grow up in Worth's shadow. Explaining Barry Jr.'s yearningly tender feelings for his brother, Sallie says that Nursie once told her of a time when Worth and Barry were quite small and were gazing together at the night sky at Melcombe. "You can have the moon and all the other stars," Barry told his older brother, "but just let me have the evening star."

Sarah Bingham, whom the family called Sallie, was born in 1937 and was quickly recognized as the writer in the family, sending poems to her father during World War II and carefully printing them in a red leather book that he sent to her from London and that she still has.

Sallie says she always considered herself to be an outsider, a person apart from Worth and Barry, who were nearly inseparable. It was only later, she said, that she came to realize—and to resent—that she had been groomed by her parents for a supportive, woman's role, in contrast to her brothers, for whom management positions in the family business were assumed.

But as a child she grew particularly close to her father, and he to her, in part because she did not go away to prep school, as did her brothers. Night after night, Barry Sr. would read to her from the works of Dickens and Mark Twain. As a writer, "she was always very productive," he says. "She's a strong person and her feelings have been strongly expressed through the years."

The two other children, Jonathan, born in 1942, and Eleanor, in 1946, were raised almost as a second generation of children within the family. "Jonathan was probably the most brilliant intellectually of all," Barry Sr. says. A quiet child, he seemed drawn to science and medicine, while Eleanor was active, outgoing and gregarious. "She's never been the lonely, artistic person that Sallie was almost from the beginning," the father says.

In the Bingham tradition, Worth and Barry graduated from Harvard, and Sallie from Radcliffe, magna cum laude. Eleanor graduated from the University of Sussex, drawn to England as her aunt and uncle had been.

At college, Sallie had unusual success as a writer, and by 21 she had a three-book contract with Houghton-Mifflin. A novel, "After Such Knowledge," was published in 1959. In 1960, one of her short stories was selected for a collection of "Forty Best Stories From Mademoiselle," and she seemed headed for a successful writing career. She married and moved to New York, with no intention of involving herself in the family business or returning to Louisville.

Worth and Barry Jr. also were on their way. By the early 1960's Worth was working at the newpapers. Barry Jr., who had slimmed down as a rower at Harvard and in the Marines, had developed a taste for broadcasting. He had worked as a broadcast journalist for CBS and NBC, then returned to Louisville at his father's urging to work at WHAS.

Jonathan had dropped out of Harvard and soon after, in 1964, tragedy struck—the first of the Bingham family misfortunes that draw comparisons with the Kennedy clan. Living in Louisville again, Jonathan climbed a utility pole to tap electricity into a barn at Melcombe; his intent was to illuminate a reunion of the members of his boyhood Club Scout troop. When he tried to make the connection, he was electrocuted. He was 22.

Two years later, Worth, age 34, was driving a rented car with his wife, Joan, and their two children early one morning during a vacation in Nantucket. To accommodate a surfboard, the windows of the car had been rolled down and the long surfboard protruded from both sides of the car. When Worth drove too close to a parked car, the right end of the surfboard struck the car. The surfboard, in a snapping pivot, broke Worth's neck, killing him with a sort of karate chop.

For Mary Bingham and Barry Sr., whose brother and sister had passed away in the two years between Jonathan's and Worth's deaths, the tragedies were incalculable. "There were times that I wondered if I would be able to keep on." Barry Sr. says. "Nature helps, and I drew great strength through the church." As always, he depended heart and soul on his wife."

KING HOLIDAY DEDICATED TO EDUCATION ACTIVISM

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 21, 1986

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, the nation has just celebrated the first National Martin Luther King Holiday. Dr. King is not only the first black American to be honored by a national holiday, but he is the first American to be so honored who neither fought in a war nor counted military victories to his credit. He held no political office and yet this nonviolent champion of equal rights and opportunities for all was to have a profound effect on the political life of this country.

The first celebration of Martin Luther King Day presented me, and the people of my district with a unique challenge. The 12th congressional district is the 10th poorest in the Nation. The unemployment rate among our youth is over 50 percent which is exceeded by the high school dropout rate. Within this context, those of us who had remembered Dr. King were called upon to develop a program which would make his ideals and values come alive for our young people. The 12th Congressional District Martin Luther King Commission was founded to continue Dr. King's work and further the ideals which he lived and died for. The commission developed a 5-year plan for youth development and educational excellence.

The five-year plan includes the development and organization of programs on nonviolence and peace, the development of youth talent in areas such as art, the improvement of basic student skills and academic performance, the development of youth sports and recreation and an increase in parent and student involvement in education. The emphasis of programs and competitions will be on the development of academic, artistic, and physical talents and abilities. Young people must be given the opportunity to develop all of their potential. The first community celebration featured student awards for essays, art, and high academic achievement by school athletes and cheerleaders.

Martin Luther King Day belongs to all Americans. He was a man of God who respected the beliefs of others. He was a ceaseless worker for peace on a global scale as well as for peace between individuals who have reacted with reflex suspicion and dislike toward one another. He was a husband and father who knew that he could not care for his own children without caring for all children.

The 5-year plan for youth development and educational excellence is being launched in the spirit of peaceful activism which was a major component of the civil rights movement led by Dr. King. The people of the 12th congressional district have resolved to take action and resolve the problems of education which plague their district. At the end of 5 years we expect to have students who display extraordinary performance in every area. We have dedicated ourselves to this effort in memory of Martin Luther King, Jr.

THE TAX BILL MAKES BAD ECONOMIC SENSE

HON. BOB LIVINGSTON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I believe the House of Representatives made a mistake when it passed H.R. 3838, the Tax Reform Act of 1985. Economically, it will cause a severe loss of capital investment in our industrial base. Regionally, the South and Louisiana specifically, this legislation creates a tax policy which retards investment and stymies economic growth.

Before the full House debate on the tax bill, I received a letter from Mr. R.J. Sharp, vice president of South Central Bell detailing the concerns that they and their parent company, BellSouth Corp., held regarding the bill. Mr. Sharp is opposed to the bill not only from his company's standpoint, but also because of the adverse impact it would have on the economic expansion in the South. Specifically Mr. Sharp states that the repeal of the investment tax credit and the lengthening of the depreciation schedules for equipment in the capital-intensive telephone industry are just two examples why they opposed this legislation. I appreciate their comments and arguments against the committee-reported bill and I would like to include Mr. Sharp's letter in the RECORD at this point:

SOUTH CENTRAL BELL,
New Orleans, LA, December 9, 1985.

Hon. BOB LIVINGSTON,
U.S. House of Representatives, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LIVINGSTON: The tax reform program of this Congress began with goals of fairness and economic growth. The process of developing legislation that meets those laudable goals is extremely difficult in balancing diverse interests and needs.

Clearly one of the important issues has been a tax policy involving capital investment and the subsequent impact of that changed policy on economic development. To those of us who reside in the fastest growing area of the nation, a tax policy that retards capital investment retards our economic growth.

Twenty-three percent of the nation's population growth over the past 5 years, or approximately one-fourth, has been in the South. Forecasts indicate a continuing strong population growth trend in the South over the next decade. Many industries and businesses that are locating in our area require new facilities and are capital intensive.

To serve this growth in population and new business opportunity, BellSouth has a major capital program of over $2 billion per year to meet our areas growing requirements. In Louisiana, we have well over $3 billion invested in telephone plant within the state and will spend during 1985 well over $300 million with our construction programs. Obviously, these figures highlight the very capital intensive programs we have each year within the state. A tax policy that penalizes economic growth would have an unusual impact upon our area. BellSouth is concerned that trade offs in the current debate on tax reform may place a burden on those areas that are experiencing the greatest growth and require the greatest amount of capital development.

We support a national tax policy that continues the investment tax credit and provides for depreciation schedules that mirror competition and technological realities—both global and domestic. This policy will best serve our areas' growing economic base, meet the job needs of our growing population and assure a state of the art information-communication system for your constituents.

We hope that you will carefully consider this aspect of the tax debate as you prepare to vote on tax reform legislation. For the reasons outlined above, we respectfully request that you not support the recent tax bill approved by the Ways and Means Committee.

Yours very truly,

R.J. SHARP,
Vice President.
R.N. TRAVIS,
Assistant Vice President, Public Affairs.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we in the Congress know all too well the brief and tragic history of the Ukraine. All Americans and other citizens of the free world should know the sad story of that country. On a lovely building in this city is written, "Past is prologue; study the past." By knowing what happened to that once-free country, we will come to appreciate the fact that we must work to keep our freedom. If we take it for granted, it can be taken from us. I want to commend the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America for its fine work in organizing the annual Ukrainian Independence Day celebration. This year the celebration will be held on January 23. I wish the committee success in its worthwhile efforts to mark this special occasion with a fitting program.

With their declaration of independence, Ukrainians demonstrated to the world that Moscow and Kiev represented two different nations and two different mentalities. Kiev represented the democratic concept of government based on respect for human rights and the dignity of man. Moscow represented not only totalitarianism, but also a godless force of destruction. The Ukraine, with a population of over 50 million, was the first victim of Soviet aggression.

Since the tragic Soviet occupation of that land, over 10 million Ukrainians have died in the defense of their country. Today, we in the free world pay special tribute to the brave men and women of the Ukraine who are still carrying forward, at great personal danger and sacrifice, the never ending struggle for independence, and freedom. Thanks to their unfailing bravery, the cause of human rights is being carried forward. Soviet violations of the Helsinki Final Act and the Kremlin's brutal imperialism in Afghanistan are stark reminders of the fact that the Soviet bear is still willing to crush and control its neighbors. The only policy capable of shaking the foundations of the Soviet empire is a policy motivated by the idea of individual and national liberty for all. It is this ideological weapon that the Communists fear most. Let our Government never pause in its struggle to win the independence of the Ukraine and keep Afghanistan free. With our help, the gift of freedom will be a reality for the imprisoned nations that encircle our planet.

There is also another group of people who deserve our praise. I want to pay tribute to the millions of Americans of Ukrainian descent who have given much of themselves to make America the great Nation that it is today. These hard-working citizens have toiled in farms and fields and sweated in America's industry to win a better life for future generations. Ukrainian-Americans treasure their freedom and respect the desire for freedom of others. They have not forgotten their brothers and sisters in the Ukraine who yearn for the liberty that we take for granted.

Let me again commend the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America for its admirable efforts in sustaining this struggle for human freedom. In the end, the power of the human spirit will triumph over the forces of oppression.

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, as cochairman of the Democratic Council on Ethnic-Americans, whose goal is to bring traditional ethnic concerns and values to the forefront of the Democratic Party's agenda, I want to draw the attention of my colleagues to this observance of Ukrainian Independence Day.

Today, while over 50 million people live under Soviet domination in the land once known as the Ukraine, persons of Ukrainian heritage in the United States and the free world solemnly observe the inhumanity visited upon their homeland and people throughout its history by its captors.

While the Soviet Union would have us believe that their Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic is a fully sovereign state with constitutional rights for its people, the truth of the matter reveals a brutal and very different reality. The Ukraine as we know it today is but a colony of Soviet Russia with little, if any, local autonomy. Its constitution notwithstanding, petitions for true independence from the U.S.S.R. would be illegal and punishable by death.

For all practical purposes, the "sovereignty" that we remember for Ukrainians on this day is but a distant memory of the proud revolution that lasted from 1917 until 1922.

Historically, while the Ukraine fended off invasions and occupations for many years before the 1917 revolution, its long-held disputes with Russia set the stage for subjugation in the modern era. When the Ukrainian National Republic declared independence in 1918, the country found itself between Russian Reds and Whites. Without the benefit of foreign aid and surrounded by hostile forces, the Ukraine was ultimately defeated in a bitter struggle that left the Bolsheviks in control. At this time the Ukraine was once again reannexed to Russia, and the stage was set for incorporation into the Soviet empire. This association of the Ukraine with Soviet Russia has only caused pain, suffering and death for millions of Ukrainians, and stands as a lasting reminder to nations around the globe that fraternity with Soviet Russia always means occupation and an end to basic dignity and human rights. Indeed, the mass murders of Ukrainians that began with the Stalin era in 1929 are perhaps the starkest reminder of the lengths to which the Soviets will go to oppress those within their grip.

Under Stalin, the political killings that marked his first years in power were accelerated with the collectivization of agriculture. Meeting with the fierce resistance that has always marked the Ukrainian spirit, Stalin decided to force matters to a final resolution. The Ukrainian crop harvest of 1932 was confiscated by the Soviets causing a famine of genocide proportions.

By the end of 1933, millions of Ukrainians had died from this artificial, manmade famine.

During World War II, Ukrainians suffered greatly and were further victimized at the war's end when Stalin again requisitioned Ukrainian grain to feed Russia.

It is not possible to estimate accurately the human toll of war, famine, and state terrorism in 20th century Ukraine. From what little data are available, we do know that at least 15 million Ukrainians were left dead, and countless perished as a direct result of Stalin's atrocities.

Despite its history of persecution, on this Ukrainian Independence Day, we celebrate the enduring Ukrainian spirit of fierce pride and resolve for the future. Despite its suffering, the Ukraine's rich cultural heritage has never succumbed to Soviet domination and terror, although individual poets and writers such as Taras Shevchenko, and Mykola Khvylovy were officially suppressed and tortured.

In like manner, the practice of religion by Christians and Jews in Ukraine has survived repeated attempts by the Soviet authorities to extinguish it.

Mr. Speaker, Ukrainian-Americans join together with the people of the Ukraine, on this day, in remembering the atrocities they have endured. But perhaps more important, on this day, their voices rise up to proclaim that a people and its religion and culture will not be ended by Communist oppression. The true spirit of freedom that so embodied the brief and glorious Ukrainian Revolution of 1917–22 is still alive and will not die. This is what we honor on this important day, and this is what I urge my colleagues to remember and observe.

IKE'S LESSON, UNLEARNED

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, as the debate over how to balance the budget heats up, it is imperative that my colleagues join together to formulate a fair balance between the country's military needs and the needs of a strong, healthy economy. In his 8 years in office, President Eisenhower never stopped stressing the importance of striving for vigorous growth in the economy not burdened by a huge defict caused by a vast defense buildup. An editorial in the January 21, 1986, issue of the New York Times titled "Ike's Lesson, Unlearned" compares Ike's spending priorities with those of the present administration. I urge my colleagues to carefully study this important message.

IKE'S LESSON, UNLEARNED

A quarter-century ago, after guiding America through eight years of peace and prosperity, President Eisenhower delivered a famous farewell address. It is best remembered for warning against "the acquisition of unwarranted influence . . . by the military-industrial complex. But Ike's valedictory centered on a more fundamental theme: balancing defense spending with the needs of a healthy economy. None of his successors has ignored that advice more than Ronald Reagan.

During the Eisenhower years the Soviet Union and China were resurgent hostile powers that probed menacingly, from Korea to Berlin, for Western weakness. Ike came under incessant pressure from Congress and the armed services to increase defense spending. But even in the near-panic over the Berlin crisis and the Soviet launching of the Sputnik satellite, he refused to let the Pentagon budget unbalance the Federal budget.

Now, instead of a vigorous Sino-Soviet alliance Mr. Reagan faces an independent China and a Soviet Union whose ideology has grown unsalable abroad and unserviceable at home. While America could not have long maintained its huge margin of nuclear superiority of the 50's, it has pushed far forward in everything else that matters—most notably a healthy, innovative economy. Yet in the dream of regaining the strategic margin, Mr. Reagan has put the economy at risk. Instead of a steady and sustainable improvement in defense he has embarked on a crash buildup, financed by vast deficits.

Like Mr. Reagan, Ike viewed the Soviet Union as a ruthless adversary. But he judged endurance and an economy unburdened with deficits to be the essential response, not "emotional and transitory sacrifices." Like Mr. Reagan, he heard Edward Teller, the hydrogen-bomb maker, urge development of new kinds of nuclear weaponry. But he knew enough about weapons to impose his own judgments of military necessity. When the Air Force pressed for a nuclear-powered aircraft, Ike wondered if the next proposal would be to put wings on the liner Queen Elizabeth.

He would surely have rejected a "Star Wars" missile defense. When the Gaither Commission recommended its contemporary equivalent, a $30 billion program of civil defense, Eisenhower turned it down flat, with his usual lecture about balance, avoidance of panic and the danger of becoming a "garrison state," notes Stephen Ambrose, the historian.

Ike knew the difference between national security and service rivalries. "Some day," he wrote to his friend Swede Hazlett, "there is going to be a man sitting in my present chair who has not been raised in the military services and who will have little understanding of where slashes in their estimates can be made with little or no damage. If that should happen while we still have the state of tension that now exists in the world, I shudder to think of what could happen in this country."

Mr. Reagan and Secretary of Defense Weinberger have given the armed services everything each demands, without discrimination or overall plan. In the process, Mr. Reagan has run up crushing deficits and doubled the national debt.

Mr. Reagan faces a more complex world than Ike. His deficits, defense spending and refusal to raise taxes serve his goal of reducing domestic spending. His strategic buildup has caught Soviet attention and may yet secure a significant arms agreement. But the buildup and the deficits are high-risk departures from Ike's advice. If these gambles fail, Mr. Reagan will have launched a furious renewal of both the arms race and inflation.

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

Tuesday, January 21, 1986

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, this past Monday in Inglewood, a city I am fortunate to represent, I participated in a very moving march and ceremony to honor Dr. Martin Luther King, and his dream. The highlight of the ceremony for me was the reading by two inspired children, a 12th grader and a 5th grader, of tributes they prepared about Dr. King. These two children delivered the prize winning speeches in a competition sponsored by the Inglewood City School System.

I believe that Dr. King would have been moved and gratified, as I was, to hear those eloquent young people working today to help achieve his dream.

One of the prize-winning speeches was prepared by Jarrod Johnson, a 5th grade student who is now being taught by Mr. Richard Barter and Mrs. Susan Atkins. Ms. Georgia Klaras is the principal of the Worthington school.

Michell Shields, a senior at Morningside High School, delivered the other prize-winning speech. Ms. JoAnn Jolly Sparks serves as Michell's counselor and Jerrie Martin is the principal of Morningside High.

I insert copies of these powerful tributes to Dr. King by Jarrod and Michell in the RECORD at this point, and I urge colleagues to take the time to read them. When you do, you will be as inspired as I was in hearing them delivered.

THE FOLLOWING IS THE TEXT DELIVERED BY MICHELL SHIELDS, MORNINGSIDE HIGH SCHOOL, 12TH GRADE

Blacks have been repressed for more than 200 years. Ever since the first shipload of indentured servants sailed to the English North American colonies in 1619, all black people were titled slaves and treated as third class citizens, under the second class poor whites of course. But over the years, there have been many people to help rectify this situation of blacks. A few of the best known are: Frederick Douglass who wrote the North Star paper during the middle 1800's, telling of the injustices faced by slaves; Harriet Tubman, who helped more than 200 slaves escape during the Civil War; and Booker T. Washington, who founded the now prestigious Tuskegee Institute for blacks in 1881.

But blacks were not the only ones sympathetic to the problems faced by slaves. One of the most famous and important was our 16th President, Abraham Lincoln. In 1863, President Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation Act that freed the slaves. But were they free? Were they treated equally in society? Needless to say, they were not.

Blacks were not the only ones persecuted because of people's ignorance for the God-given right to be treated equal. There were the Indians, who were forced to leave the now America by the English and British, all the way through to the Jewish people in Nazi Germany during the Second World War.

Many began to wonder when would all the injustices end? Everyone has the unalienable right to be treated equally in all aspects of life. But one, a man who did not just sit around wondering, decided to get out and help the cause. He had a dream. It was a dream deeply rooted in the American dream, that one day this nation would rise up and live out the true meaning of its creed, and he held these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal.

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. did have a dream. He saw the abuses of people against people as a child. As he grew older, he started realizing different parts of his dream. By the time he was a young man, he started to preach his dream to any and all who would listen, and to those who would not. Upturned noses, closed ears, and big mouths did not keep Dr. King from preaching what he had to preach.

The time of most turmoil in his life was during the 1950's and 60's, but greatly because of him, bills were passed by President Johnson's Administration. The Civil Rights Act of 1957 started the United States Civil Rights Commission to stop voter discrimination and gave the Attorney General power to go to Federal Court about any known interference with the right to vote. And the Civil Rights Act of 1960 started voting referees to help qualified voters to register and vote.

But the cause continued. On August 28, 1963, over a quarter of a million people from many nationalities, races, religions, and beliefs all came together to support the dream for all to be equal in the historical March on Washington. Miraculously to some, but unsurprisingly to others, the event did greatly affect the Kennedy Administration that was in office during that time. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 was passed that forbid any discriminatory voting registration requirements, and also, the Voting Rights Act of 1965 that charged that the state's poll tax law for voting was unconstitutional and suspended it from being used in any state.

Blacks have come a long way since the days of the back seat of the buses and separate drinking fountains, but as always, there is still a long path to be traveled. Discrimination is not on paper or signs anymore, but unfortunately, it is still in the hearts and minds of many. For some older people, discrimination is on the skin bruised; for some younger people today, discrimination is in the mind confused. Nevertheless, the dream continues to live by many means, whether it be USA for Africa and Live Aid, a variety of musicians coming together to help starving people in Africa; or concerned Americans wanting to help persecuted immigrants—the dream is still there, people helping people for a better way of life.

It does a heart good to see the concern, love, and devotion people put out everyday in causes, be it save the whales or save the world. Some say it is a fad, but faith and spirit can never go out of style. As long as we keep the faith, hope, and dream, someone will always be there for the people in the world.

Yes, the dream does live and through many ways—through music by Stevie Wonder, through religion by Reverend Jesse Jackson, and through a great man's and husband's spirit, by Coretta Scott King.

Today is a day that has been long overdue—17 years overdue since the time of Dr. King's death. Today marks the first time that Dr. King's birthday will be celebrated as a national holiday.

Yes, blacks have come a long way since 17 years ago, and many have died never knowing just how far we have come. But we still have to keep striving for the culmination of Dr. King's dream for all to be equal. Though in the end, only God Himself will be the equalizer for that. We all should try everyday to give Him a little less work to do, through patience, openmindedness, and understanding for all those who are not different from us, but the same as us, all living a dream to be equal.

THE FOLLOWING IS THE TEXT OF "LIVING THE DREAM" BY JARROD JOHNSON, WORTHINGTON SCHOOL, FIFTH GRADE

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., was a man that had a dream that one day people of all nations, races, and religion would come together as one and live as brothers sharing each other's lives, giving of themselves not just one day out of a year, but each day of their lives.

Although Dr. King died before I was born, I have heard and read a lot about him; what a great man he was to try and make * * * but he took on the responsibility himself because he knew by being a spiritual-minded man and believing and trusting in God, all things are possible.

Many times there were obstacles put in his way to discourage him but he never gave up the dream that one day all men will be treated equally—not judged by the color of their skin or by how much money a person has, but by his abilities as a man.

Many times he was put in jail, even beaten, but he never gave up because he knew someone had to try and he knew that his dream had to come through and he was going to do everything in his power with the help of God, and with the help of other people who wanted the same things that he wanted to come true. One day all men, women, and children would enjoy a life of success, joy, and happiness. This world was created not for some of the people but for all of the people.

One day they succeeded in taking his life. That's all they were able to take away from him. They were not able to take away his dream or his beliefs. No, Dr. King's death was not for nothing. Because today we children are the ones who are living the dream. We no longer have to sit in the back of the bus. We do not have to enter the back door of a restaurant. Yes, we are the ones who are benefiting from that dream. My mother sometimes sits and tells my sisters and brothers and me how it was in the old days. Before integration, blacks were separated from whites in schools, where they worked, and where they ate as well.

Now because of Dr. King's hard work and because of that dream that he gave his life for, we are living that dream. Today children of different races are free to go to schools where they want to. Because of that dream we can learn all we can and enjoy our life and live wherever we want to. Dr. King, we thank you from the bottom of our hearts for not giving up on dreaming and your honest belief that your dream would and could come true.

NO IRS BIG BROTHER

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, Americans pay their taxes more faithfully than perhaps the taxpayers of any other country, one reason being that most taxpayers believe their tax information is confidential. Now they are finding that it is not, that an obscure 1985 law authorizes the IRS to withhold tax refunds due to people allegedly in default on government loans.

Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the San Jose Mercury News points out the problems arising when the IRS is turned into a policeman.

NO IRS BIG BROTHER

Those federal deficits, that went over $100 billion for the first time in 1982 and topped $200 billion for the first time in 1983, led Congress to pass the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, which had absolutely no effect on the deficit, now projected at $220 billion for 1986.

Nevertheless, hidden away in that irrelevant act was an unnoticed provision just now coming into effect: Starting with 1985 tax returns, the Internal Revenue Service is to withhold any tax refunds due to people allegedly in default on government loans.

It is not to condone deadbeats to say that this is a lousy idea, which should never have been passed and should be dumped after a two-year trial period. The job of the IRS is to collect taxes and ensure tax compliance—not to become ex officio courts to try, convict and fine people who allegedly owe the government money on non-tax related matters.

According to the Office of Management and Budget, the IRS's new police function will be used to get at some 650,000 individuals in default on $1.3 billion for past and present student loans to the Department of Education.

Another 100,000 people are targeted for allegedly being in default on loans from the Department of Housing and Urban Affairs, Small Business Administration, Veterans Administration and Agriculture Department.

So what's wrong with using one government agency to collect for defaults to another? In our view, several things.

First of all it is interesting to note the testimony of Roscoe Egger, the IRS commissioner, in hearings last September before the House Ways and Means Committee.

Noting that a 1982 law had mandated the IRS to withhold refunds due to people allegedly delinquent in child support payments, Egger testified that IRS studies showed that people thus fined were "twice as likely to become non-filers and three times as likely to have a tax delinquency in the following year."

Thus the first thing wrong with using the IRS as a policeman is that it doesn't work. People stop filing or start filing late, costing the government money on both accounts.

That's the short, technical reason we don't like the idea. But there is a philosophical one that goes deeper.

Why did those people stop filing or start filing late?

According to Egger, it is because most taxpayers believe their tax information is confidential. To turn the IRS into a policeman "violates their trust" in the tax system. This attitude, "right or wrong," he said, "is real."

Big government is bad when it begins resembling the monolithic state envisaged by George Orwell in his classic "1984" (ironically, the year this provision was passed).

Let the IRS collect taxes. If the federal government wants to go after deadbeats, it can do so the way everybody else does it—through bill collectors and legal claims. The IRS has enough to do—and faces enough opprobrium as it is—without being turned into Big Brother.

STEPHEN BACCUS

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in the 17th District of Florida there resides a young man who is a remarkable example to our youth and to all of us. What he has done demonstrates not only God-given talent and ability, but his own commitment to himself, his family, and society. On January 19, 1986, Stephen Baccus graduated from the University of Miami Law School. At the age of 16 he is the youngest person ever to graduate from law school. This latest accomplishment tops the fact that at the age of 12 he was the youngest student ever to enter New York University. At 14 he graduated with honors from the University of Miami with a bachelor of science degree in computer science and math. I expect that he will some day be the youngest Chief Justice ever.

We are all proud of Stephen and I would like to insert in the RECORD part of the text of the invitation his parents prepared for the celebration of his marvelous achievement:

We the People of the United States of America, through the infinite wisdom of our founding fathers, have been endowed with the opportunity to excel in every aspect of life. An individual needs only to aspire and persevere in order to prosper. Stephen Baccus is one such individual. Yet, the day is rare when one achieves the heights of excellence as Stephen has. Let it be known that at the age of sixteen years, Stephen has become the youngest graduate of Law School in history. A special day in Stephen's honor is therefore declared * * *.

TOWARD A NATIONAL NUTRITION MONITORING SYSTEM

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, in the midst of this winter season, images of homeless and hungry people are appearing daily on television screens and in the press. The problem of hunger in this country is real. As a people, we have yet to realize its true magnitude.

Although private sources have estimated that 10 to 20 million Americans suffer from malnutrition, the number of hungry Americans cannot be found in official statistics. Until this problem is quantified, an effective remedy will not be created.

Good "nutrition" is hard to measure. The wide array of Federal, State, and local agencies concerned with nutrition confirm how important it is. But that same wide array of those involved has led to a wide variation in how different agencies approach nutrition. Data is now collected in accordance with each agency's own mission, often with little thought given to its relationship to other studies.

Until this monitoring activity can be coordinated, the true picture of America's nutritional status remains unclear. We now spend millions of taxpayers' funds in nutrition-related efforts in a wide variety of Government agencies. We have an obligation to spend that money responsibly, in a coordinated fashion.

We now have the opportunity to unify these efforts through a National Nutrition Monitoring System—now before us as H.R. 2436, titled the National Nutrition Monitoring and Related Research Act of 1985. Through this structure, information would pass in a streamlined fashion through a central body where a data base would be maintained from which policy decisions can be made.

I would like to introduce into the RECORD an editorial by Lynn Parker, senior nutritionist at the Food Research and Action Center which appeared in the Pittsburgh Post Gazette. I urge my colleagues to consider the beneficial effect which H.R. 2436 would have on monitoring and enhancing the nutritional status of our citizens.

[From the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, Nov. 26, 1985]

(By Lynn Parker)

NO NUMBERS ON HUNGRY PEOPLE

WASHINGTON.—How many Americans go hungry each day?

Nobody really knows and it's about time we found out. But so far, despite growing concern, there have been no official numbers from the government.

In 1983, then presidential counselor Edwin Meese III said about hunger in America: "I've heard a lot of anecdotal stuff but I haven't heard any authoritative figures." That's just the point.

Food-stamp rolls, emergency food program use and welfare applications strongly indicate that hunger in America has been steadily increasing over the last five years. Private studies have put figures anywhere between 10 and 20 million Americans suffering from malnutrition.

The Reagan administration's task force on hunger studied the issue for a year and came to the conclusion in 1983 that it couldn't be sure if there is widespread hunger across the nation. The task force attributed its uncertainty to the "lack of up-to-date data, [which] has made it impossible to assess whether the current nutritional status of the population has worsened over the last few years."

That's totally unacceptable in a country that can tell us how many toasters and food processors America uses each year.

Several physician and public-interest groups have conducted studies of their own on hunger in America, but these cannot be considered substitutes for continuous government monitoring of the problem.

As long as America's hungry remain uncounted, policy-makers will be able to use lack of data as an excuse for not making bold moves to combat hunger.

Members of the House of Representatives and the Senate often express frustrations about the lack of up-to-date information on the extent of hunger in our country. Some have called into question the credibility of private surveys documenting the problem.

The answer to the dilemma of not having authoritative and timely national data is a national nutrition monitoring system that would allow us to keep a watch over the nutritional problems in different sections of the country. The federal government could initiate such a system without creating any new bureaucracy simply by better coordinating the collection of nutrition information gathered by numerous government offices, from the Department of Agriculture to the Army.

The Department of Health and Human Services could take responsibility for coordinating the collection of all nutrition information and could continuously report to the Congress and the public on the nutritional problems of our population nationally, as well as by region.

The government is already doing this type of monitoring in several other areas of our national well-being: The Labor Department reports on employment, the Commerce Department reports on Gross National Product and leading economic indicators and the Centers for Disease Control reports on the incidence of illnesses.

The federal government could also provide technical and financial assistance to state and local governments in their efforts to pinpoint areas of hunger that may be overlooked even in the best national survey and use these as early-warning systems for national problems.

Congress has an opportunity this year to enact a national nutrition-monitoring plan. Reps. Buddy MacKay, D-Fla., Doug Walgren, D-Pa., George Brown, D-Cal., and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., have introduced legislation in the House and Senate to authorize the Department of Health and Human Services to coordinate all nutrition information for the government.

The Reagan administration opposed similar legislation last year, arguing that the program would be too "cumbersome" and inefficient.

In fact, the effect would be just the opposite. A system of coordinating would streamline the bureaucracy and help states and localities work together with the federal agencies to provide Mr. Meese and others in government with "authoritative figures" on which to base their judgments.

If we put such a program of continuous monitoring into place this year, we would be in a better position to fight hunger in 1985 and prevent hunger in the future.

ANDREI SAKHAROV

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

Tuesday, January 21, 1986

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, today we recognize the sixth anniversary of a terrible event—the Soviet Government's condemnation of Dr. Andrei Sakharov and his wife, Dr. Elena Bonner, to internal exile in the closed city of Gorky. This anniversary is of special concern to the Congress and the international community because it marks our sixth year without one of the world's foremost advocates for human rights.

As a member of the European Conference on Security and Cooperation which monitors compliance with the 1975 Helsinki accords on human rights, I reject the Soviets' claim that Dr. Sakharov poses a threat to their country's security. The actions by the Soviets in Dr. Sakharov's case directly contravene their legal obligations under the Helsinki Final Act.

The Soviet Government's decision to allow Dr. Bonner to seek medical care in the United States could be viewed as a gesture of good faith. But its significance was undermined by the Soviets' order that she not speak out while in our country. We must also look beyond the public relations screen provided by Dr. Bonner's temporary release to the fact that her husband remains in ill health and requires urgent medical care. The Soviet Government must be compelled to allow Dr. Sakharov to enjoy the rights and privileges which he has sought so tirelessly for others.

The Soviet Union's refusal to provide information about the health and whereabouts of Dr. Sakharov serves to emphasize that country's inadequate concern for the rights of its citizens. This is a point which the House has repeatedly recognized by unanimously passing a series of resolutions on behalf of Dr. Sakharov, including one which I offered in June 1984.

Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to remind the Soviet Union that its temporary release of Dr. Bonner will not dilute our concern for her or her husband. I urge my colleagues to continue their campaign for the release of the Sakharovs, as well as for all Soviet prisoners of conscience.

GREAT SHIPS—FAIR PRICE

HON. G. WILLIAM WHITEHURST

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, during the weekend of January 17–18, 1986, it was my privilege to participate in the Founders' Day celebrations commemorating the 100th anniversary of the establishment of the Newport News Shipbuilding Co.

The guest speaker at the dinner on Friday evening was Adm. James D. Watkins, Chief of Naval Operations, and I found his remarks so meaningful that I am pleased to take this opportunity to share them with my colleagues.

Anyone who shares my concern over the future of our national defense and the quality of our military equipment will be heartened by Admiral Watkins' words, but reminded that we cannot afford to lay back on our oars, else we will lose our hard-won advantage.

The article follows:

GREAT SHIPS—FAIR PRICE

It is indeed a pleasure to share founders' day and your centennial celebration, but maybe not for the reasons you might think. You might think I was invited here tonight because Navy is the largest user of Newport News products. Or, you might think I am here tonight to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the day Dwight D. Eisenhower coined the phrase "military industrial complex," which he did in his farewell address on January 17, 1961 . . .

Actually, I was invited to speak tonight because I had a brush with Newport News by birth—long before I joined the Navy. You see, my mother's father—George Clinton Ward—knew and worked for your founder, Collis P. Huntington. Grandfather was a native of New York, where his first work was on the construction of iron bridges and in railroad engineering. Collis hired him because he had heard of his engineering skills, and made him chief engineer of the Racquette Lake Railroad in New York, which Collis owned. Collis used to brag about him so much that grandfather was hired away . . . by another Huntington, nephew Henry E., who as you know became one of the owners of Newport News upon the death of Collis in 1900.

At the turn of the century, grandfather modernized a water supply system in Ohio for Henry, who in 1905 persuaded him to move to California.

So, grandfather became the general manager of Huntington Land and Improvement Company in California. My grandfather became a close friend and confidant of Henry; in fact, my mother would chat with him for hours when he visited our family on Sunday afternoons in California. My sister, Arabella Huntington Watkins James, here with us tonight, was even named after Henry's wife. So, the Huntington name has always been a living legend in our family, and I was honored when Ed Campbell asked me to speak on this special anniversary.

But, for another reason, this is also a homecoming of sorts . . . for Newport News shipbuilding is an important part of naval history. Seven Newport News-built warships were part of the Great White Fleet. By the outbreak of World War I, 20 percent of the Navy's total tonnage had been built by Newport News. Moreover, the history of World War II carrier operations in the Pacific is the history of Newport News ships—in great sea battles involving the carriers Enterprise, Yorktown, Hornet, and Essex.

Today, when crisis looms on the horizon, and a U.S. response is deemed prudent or necessary, it is often a Newport-News-built aircraft carrier asked to steam into harm's way on a moment's notice.

Earlier this month for example, when tensions boiled in the Mediterranean, after the tragic murder of passengers awaiting flights in Rome and Vienna, it was Newport News' own USS Coral Sea, 39 years young, that got the alert call. You obviously build them to last!

And, in 1981, it was USS Nimitz, epitome of airpower at sea, which launched aircraft to down those two foolish Libyan impediments to freedom who dared to fire the first salvo at our airplanes.

You were also in on the ground floor of submarine technology, pioneering in the business with construction of Simon Lake's earliest successfully operated submersibles in 1905. More recently, you delivered the lead ship of the USS Los Angeles class, the most highly-capable type of nuclear attack submarine in the world today. Seventeen of her sisters have been, or are being, built by you. I was just aboard one of your fine products, USS Birmingham, during a recent visit to Hawaii. Your contribution to national security for 100 years has been uniquely impressive.

Unfortunately, the world has changed since our youthful days. In 1904, a Newport-News-built ship, the battleship Virginia, was launched. A State holiday immediately was declared. In contrast, 75 years later, when boats of the Los Angeles class were launched, groups in certain cities honored with a namesake ship protested the event while others questioned the need for a strong navy, saying we should make do with less.

The need to convince all Americans just how important a navy—and a strong shipbuilding capability—are to the security of this Nation has never been greater. We must convince the misinformed of this at every misstep of their way.

Unfortunately, insofar as industrial capacity is concerned, we have not always been convincing and our time is running out. We are now down to about 25 major private yards. And, a recent study found that this number could shrink to 17 yards by decade's end if threatened reductions to proposed naval shipbuilding take place. Aggregate shipyard employment could then decline by more than 30 percent.

As we found before World War II, the task of trying to reestablish a shipbuilding industry after skilled craftsmen leave the yards and seek jobs elsewhere is both time-consuming and painful. And, time at the onset of the next conflict will not be on our side. Additionally, once shipyards are closed today and their gates locked, the most likely use for the property is development as high-rise condos and resort hotels. So, even the land is lost. Our endangered maritime industry species is indeed on the verge of extinction. We, as a nation, so dependent on the seas for livelihood, must be concerned.

How can we avoid this? Well, for those who have sailed, you know the only thing that overcomes instability is steady forward motion. That is what we need today. In the tough media environment and close public scrutiny of the 1980's, where defense critics seem to snipe from under every rock, this will take aggressive action and cohesive leadership from all of us who care about the future of American sea power.

For our part, Navy has instituted new management rigor and business acumen in our shipbuilding practices and accounts. We have pulled the reins in on our own inefficient practices of the past, such as the generation of a seemingly endless flow of change orders after initial contract negotiations.

What has been the result of these and related efforts? Between 1982 and 1985, we took delivery of more than 80 ships. Of these, almost half were delivered early, with nearly the entire balance delivered on time . . . and below cost projections. Over the same period, all our submarines were delivered on or ahead of schedule.

Newport News shipbuilding can continue to pick up the gauntlet of progress . . . to show by action that this Nation's maritime underpinnings can remain intact. As Virginia's largest employer, as the largest privately-owned shipyard in the Western Hemisphere, and the only yard capable of building our super carriers, you have in a sense grasped the baton of shipbuilding leadership. You must set the example, and show this Nation we still need good ships, built and repaired at fair prices.

As you know, the Soviet Union is now building their first true aircraft carriers, each about the size of one of your earlier products, USS Midway. The first ship of this class was just launched and is expected to be underway late in this decade. Now, I can guarantee one thing . . . she will be no match for the Teddy Roosevelt I saw christened at your shipyard last October. No, we're not overly concerned about Soviet competition in this Newport-News-Dominated area yet. But, you must never let up on helping us keep our lead over the Soviets in carrier air capability at sea. You must continue to produce quality products of proven worth, which taxpayers can also agree have come at a fair cost to them.

One of the surest ways to put ourselves out of business would be to lose the public's trust by doing otherwise. If the Nation ever thinks we in uniform and you in industry are indifferent to cost and quality, or that we, together, are "fat cats" feasting out of a cornucopia of defense dollar largess, we will certainly lose the public's confidence and, hence, support of the Congress. What a tragedy for our Nation would then ensue. Unfortunately, we already see some signs of this, with so much criticism in the media and elsewhere. So we must work doubly hard and fast to eliminate the considerable unfairness there and to reverse negative perceptions.

So, Navy will continue to work with you to obtain the best for the American taxpayer, turning out the finest ships possible for dollars they have invested. At the same time, we know that a just profit need not be incompatible with just stewardship of the public's money. This Nation was built on fair competition and product excellence, and our economy and Nation function best when these principles are upheld in the marketplace.

As is customary, the procrastinators club came out with their annual predictions for last year in January of this year. Naturally, every prediction was on the mark. But, we do not need to procrastinate another year in order to make our predictions for 1986. For we will surely founder again on the rocks and shoals of national neglect, as we did last decade, if we allow this Nation to think that we are wallowing in excessive profits and gross mismanagement. So, to predict and achieve the very opposite, we need but uphold the most rigorous standards so we can open ourselves to the closest scrutiny by all our citizenry.

The emphasis must remain on quality—on good ships. As never before, we need a navy built to last, built to carry our people in harm's way, win and return them home again safely. As we have all been reminded again just this week, when tensions build and crises flare, it will be Navy called to the fore, ordered to sail with the tide and bring U.S. force to bear. Our people—the best seagoing professionals in the world, bar none—deserve the best of America's technological genius. After all, our superb people and American technological genius are the two largest gems in our crown of superiority.

In 1893, your yard bid on its first naval contracts for three small gunboats. There was some protest that you lacked the experience needed to build these ships. But your young yard was awarded the contract because your bid was the best.

About those early contracts, Collis Huntington wrote, "The price seems very low and more particularly so, as you know my feeling is that every ship we build . . . should be first-class in quality. What I want to do is to have for this yard the reputation of building the best ships. So do not make any calculations on scrimping the work on any of their parts."

Yes, there were some early losses on these contracts, but the motto stuck with the yard, and you became a standout among the Nation's most important shipyards.

If Collis Huntington had not taken such tough action, even in the face of possible short-term financial loss, the heroes of Midway and Coral Sea in World War II, and of the Gulf of Sidra in 1981, would not have sailed in Newport News' products. The payback for Nation and company was worth the risk and the effort put forth.

It should now be our task to cling to the motto and continue to accept the challenge of Collis Huntington for the next hundred years. The Nation's security and your future depend on it.

Thank you, God bless, and happy birthday.

AIRPORT SECURITY ACT

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, as we begin the second session of the 99th Congress, the Foreign Affairs Committee will resume its intensive consideration of ways to combat international terrorism. The committee has scheduled briefings on the implementation of the International Airport Security Act, which was adopted by the Congress last summer as part of the foreign aid bill, as well as the recently announced findings of the Vice President's Task Force on Terrorism. The committee intends to continue its oversight hearings on ways to improve international maritime security, the ongoing Anti-Terrorism Training Assistance Program to friendly countries, and finally the threat of nuclear terrorism. In addition, the committee will continue to press for greater international cooperation against terrorism by exploring the feasibility of creating an international coordinating committee and other such avenues.

In this regard, I would like to commend to my colleagues a Washington Post article by Daniel F. Kohler of the Rand Corp. His article proposes an effective way for our European allies to support the United States economic isolation of Libya. Specifically, Mr. Kohler suggests that our European allies stop providing subsidized credits to Libya, which frees up Libyan currency to train international terrorists. In my judgment this approach would be an appropriate mechanism for our European allies to begin to take effective steps to enhance international cooperation to combat the growing scourge of international terrorism. As the administration discusses with our allies ways to enhance cooperation to combat terrorism, I would encourage them to carefully review and consider Mr. Kohler's suggestion in the following article.

A SANCTION THAT WOULD PINCH QADDAFI

STOP THE TRADE CREDITS

(By Daniel F. Kohler)

The United States has had enough, and the president has decided to impose economic sanctions on Libya. But the effect of these sanctions is likely to be little more than symbolic, particularly in view of the fact that our European allies seem unlikely to join in this effort. Economic sanctions don't work, they argue, and besides, the United States cannot expect them to prohibit profitable business relations with Libya solely on the basis of the tenuous circumstantial evidence linking Col. Muammar Qaddafi to the murders in Vienna and Rome.

There are some minimal sanctions, however, that we could expect the European governments to agree to because they would actually benefit economically from them, even though they may not recognize or admit it.

Not all trade is profitable for Europeans. Almost 20 percent of West European exports to Libya are financed with export credits that are officially supported and subsidized by the West European governments, particularly West Germany and Great Britain. The value of such export credit subsidies to the Libyan government exceeds $40 million to $50 million per year. You can train a lot of terrorists for $40 million.

The form that such subsidies take is usually a repayment guarantee to West European businesses or banks that give credit to Qaddafi. Such a guarantee affords the Libyans preferential access to West European financial markets to finance imports. With such a guarantee, Qaddafi can borrow deutschemarks in Frankfurt or pounds sterling in London at interest rates that are lower than what most West German or British firms have to pay. The outstanding balances on such guaranteed credits from West European governments to Libya have for the past four years fluctuated between $1.2 billion and $2 billion, which corresponds to $350 to $570 for every Libyan man, woman and child.

It is in the Europeans' interest to stop subsidizing the Qaddafi regime through preferential trade credits. True, discontinuing such subsidies might reduce the exports of those European firms that are in the business of providing Qaddafi with anything from management services to bombs and ammunition. Also true, the economic pinch of such a sanction is too slight to make Qaddafi wince. Libya can probably borrow from private banks even without government guarantees, albeit at a higher interest rate, or choose to offset any losses in officially supported export credits by selling more oil on the open market.

Nevertheless, a removal of Western credit subsidies might have some effect. Given that such subsidies are common practice throughout the world, and that the entire East Bloc as well as many other totalitarian regimes and dictatorships benefit from them, refusing them to Qaddafi would serve as an indication that he doesn't even qualify for that less-than-illustrious group.

Furthermore, if Qaddafi were forced to pay the risk premiums that private bankers would attach to unguaranteed loans to Libya, he would have to bear the costs of his irrational actions. Each new terrorist outrage, each additional confrontation with the United States would increase the probability of violent conflict and thus make Libya a worse credit risk in a private banker's eyes. That would lead to increases in Libya's cost of borrowing.

Finally, increased oil sales by Qaddafi could only be welcome, because they would reduce the West's energy bill. It is also difficult to imagine any action on Qaddafi's part that would be more resented by the Arab countries that currently seem to support him.

The main benefit, however, of concentrating on a removal of export subsudies as minimal sanction is that such a proposal cannot be refused by the Europeans on the same grounds as the more comprehensive sanctions requested by the Reagan administration. If removing the subsidies has no effect, then instituting the subsidies in the first place had no effect either. The relevant question becomes why the Europeans subsidize credits to the Libyans in the first place.

More important, removing the subsidies cannot be interpreted as an unwarranted intrusion into the free market by the government. Quite the contrary; it amounts to a freeing of trade between Libya and Western Europe. Any European banker who would like to lend to Qaddafi should be free to do so. Only don't expect the European taxpayer to come to his rescue if the loans are not repaid.

Admittedly, it doesn't speak highly for Western solidarity in the face of terrorism if all we ask our allies to do is stop subsidizing the countries that harbor the terrorists. However, it is certainly better to ask for and obtain a little cooperation than to ask for a lot of cooperation and be refused.

REFORMS MISSING FROM NCAA CONVENTION

HON. JAMES J. HOWARD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, earlier this month, the National Collegiate Athletic Association [NCAA] held its annual convention. This convention was to be the one during which university presidents regained control of their athletic departments and enacted necessary reforms. Unfortunately, it appears that talk of reform is becoming ever fainter.

An article in this week's Sports Illustrated stated that the recent movement by university presidents to take control of their athletic programs is losing momentum. It pointed to the fact that matters once deemed important by the presidents were not acted upon. These matters includes: assuring satisfactory academic progress, cracking down on booster clubs, correcting widespread abuses of special-admissions programs and shortening athletic seasons. The article goes on to quote a delegate as saying, "A lot of athletic directors figure they've successfully waited out the presidents. Unless the presidents fight back, NCAA reform is flat-ass dead in the water."

Of course, one could counter by saying that the NCAA did finalize proposition 48. This controversial plan establishes minimum grade-point averages and standardized test scores for incoming athletes. If an athlete fails to meet these standards, he is ineligible to compete in sports his freshman year.

Proponents of proposition 48 believe it will increase graduation rates, but I don't think that is necessarily true. There is nothing to suggest that graduation rates will increase just because some athletes are forced to sit out a year. Proposition 48 conveniently places the responsibility for the education of athletes solely at the high school level. It warns high schools that their graduates will be ineligible during their freshman year of college if they do not meet certain academic standards. It's too bad that the NCAA isn't consistent in handing out responsibility. If it was, it would hold its own member institutions accountable for the education of athletes at the collegiate level.

The heated debate over proposition 48 brought out good arguments on both sides of the issue. The fears of black educators that this policy will disproportionately affect black athletes appears to be valid. However, proposition 48 is now on the books and we should take steps to guarantee that those athletes arriving at college under the higher standards of proposition 48 will not be neglected or exploited.

In absence of such guarantees, I introduced H.R. 2620, the College Athlete Education and Protection Act. My bill is based on the premise that collegiate athletic departments are funded through tax deductible contributions of individuals. The reason these contributions are tax deductible is because they supposedly "advance education." My legislation would require institutions who take advantage of this favorable tax status to live up to the commitment of "advancing education." Under my bill, schools failing to graduate a reasonable number of their athletes would lose their tax deductions.

This legislation fills the void created by NCAA policies. While proposition 48 requires higher standards for high schools and athletes, my bill will require the same of colleges and universities by ensuring that institutions educate their athletes.

Many have suggested that while my bill may have good intentions, it is not an area in which Congress should be involved. I strongly disagree with this assessment. I believe that Congress not only has the right, but the duty to ensure that federal tax deductions are being used in the manner in which they were intended.

The failure of the NCAA to address the problems facing intercollegiate athletics, as evidenced earlier this month, is forcing others to provide solutions.

COMPACT OF FREE ASSOCIATION

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, on December 11, 1985, the House approved the Compact of Free Association between the United States and the constitutional governments of the Federated States of Micronesia and the Marshall Islands. On December 13, 1985, the Senate also passed the joint resolution approving the compact. That legislation has also now been signed by the President, and the compact will take effect in accordance with its terms and in conjunction with termination of the U.N. trusteeship.

The compact is a comprehensive government-to-government agreement. Because of the exhaustive record created in connection with congressional review of the compact, I will not take the time on this occasion to review all of its elements or implications.

However, there is one aspect of the compact which I would like to address. I am referring to section 177 of the compact and the related provisions for settlement of all claims of Marshallese citizens arising from the U.S. nuclear testing program in the Marshall Islands following World War II. Upon personally reviewing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with respect to the compact, I discovered that last minute questions were raised regarding purported "constitutional issues" which some parties may seek to raise with respect to the section 177 settlement agreement.

If the section 177 agreement is challenged in the courts, it is the view of the Department of Justice and the Department of State, whose representatives testified on the section 177 agreement during our hearings on the compact, that the United States will prevail and that the constitutionality of this agreement will be affirmed. I tend to agree with the statements on this subject made in the section-by-section analysis of the compact offered by Senator MCCLURE, chairman of the committee which had jurisdiction over the compact in the Senate. In the December 13, 1985, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page S17651, Senator MCCLURE makes it clear that the section 177 agreement is intended by Congress to be a "full and final settlement of all nuclear effects claims." He goes on to remind us that those who are generating questions about the constitutionality of the settlement, including the espousal provisions, may be promoting protracted litigation rather than compensation for the victims.

Senator MCCLURE also refers to Senate and House agreement to expressly endorse the espousal provisions in section 103(g) of the resolution approving the compact. As a member of both the Foreign Affairs and Interior and Insular Affairs Committees of the House, the two committees which had original jurisdiction over the compact and section 177 agreement in the House, I participated in the agreement to which Senator MCCLURE refers. I can confirm that it was the intent of Congress that the section 177 be fully implemented strictly in accordance with its terms, and that the final version of section 103(g) of the resolution represents our rejection of the earlier versions of that provision.

In response to some of the questions that have been raised I would like to make the following statements:

As Congress prepared for review of the negotiated compact, the Congressional Research Service was asked to take a critical look at the document. That study was for the purpose of raising every conceivable question—in some cases even if somewhat farfetched or implausible—about all aspects of the compact, so that the members would be aware of all possible issues and potential problems. The CRS study done on the compact was useful, in that the document assisted the members in formulating questions that were submitted to the administration. However, it is a distortion to rely upon the CRS study of the compact without also looking at the administration's responses, as well as the transcripts of our hearings and the committee reports which also contain administration views on these matters. In the end, the Members of the Congress who were most actively involved with these issues, and I am included in that category, were satisfied that the administration had answered those questions. We came to the conclusion that the section 177 agreement is consistent with international law and U.S. constitutional practice. The fact that we recognize that courts may be asked by plaintiffs in some of the court cases to review the validity of the compact and the section 177 agreement does not alter the clear meaning of the settlement provisions or the provisions of section 103(g) of the resolution approving the compact.

There is one point that is seldom mentioned by those who purport to be concerned about the rights of the Marshallese claimants. I am referring to the fact that the percentage of people voting for the compact and the section 177 agreement was significantly higher in the atolls and islands of the Marshall Islands inhabited by claimants than it was in the Marshall Islands generally. The lawyers involved in these lawsuits visitied these atolls regularly and especially just before the vote and told the people to reject the compact and the section 177 agreement so that they could pursue their remedies in court. The choice presented to the claimants as voters was clear, and the U.N. report on the plebiscite finds that the people voted freely. The people knew exactly what their implications of their vote were, and they voted to approve the settlement as part of the compact. Again, most of the claimant groups voted to approve at a higher rate then the genreal population. Thus, there is no basis for the argument that the rights of the claimants were subsumed in the vote of the general population on the overall agreement. In the major population centers where claimant population is smaller, the vote for the agreement is lower than in the claimant atolls and islands. But even in the Marshall Islands as a whole the vote was decisive in favor of the compact and the section 177 settlement. This fact is too often ignored by those supposedly speaking on behalf of claimant rights.

There have been a lot of questions about the validity of espousal. The arguments we have heard questioning the espousal mechanism seem to have little connection with the factual and legal bases of the section 177 agreement. After considering the views expressed by all sides, it seems clear that when the people of the Marshall Islands, including the claimants, exercise their sovereignty through their constitutional government to enter into a settlement, and then these people, who retain their inherent sovereignty notwithstanding the fact that they are in a transition from non-self-governing status to self-government, expressly and specifically affirm that exercise of sovereignty in a free vote, then any conceivable test of international law with respect to the rights of the claimants has been met. I am referring generally to fairness and equity here. The espousal process itself is a government-to-government arrangement that is well-established and recognized under international law and U.S. practice. The Marshall Islands Government made its decision to espouse these claims, the United States recognized the authority of the Marshall Islands to make that decision within the context of its constitution and the state of affairs as the trusteeship is drawing to a close and the transition to self-government is nearly complete. The section 177 agreement meets all the legal tests I know of—and then some—by providing a tribunal for adjudication of additional claims, as well as recognizing the possibility of "changed circumstances" and future ex gratia measures. Anyone who studies the agreement, instead of listening only to the arguments of those who thrive on litigation, will recognize why Congress approved this very fair and comprehensive settlement.

LANDMARK NUMBER OF MILES PROTECTED ON THE APPALACHIAN TRAIL

HON. BEVERLY B. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to say how thrilled I am that a grand total of 85.2 miles of the Appalachian Trail has been protected as of September 1985. As the Appalachian Trail runs directly through my district of western Maryland, I have always taken a personal interest in the acquisition of trail land. My family has spent many happy times hiking portions of Maryland's 40.5 miles. My late husband, Goodloe E. Byron, both sponsored and supported legislation to increase funding for the trail's protection during his years in the Maryland State Legislature and the U.S. Congress. I am delighted to see that his dream has nearly come true.

For the RECORD, I am including a table that outlines exactly how much land was acquired this year. I am pleased to say that these numbers indicate that, out of the Appalachian Trail's 2,096.3 miles, a total of 1,831.8 miles have been protected. That amounts to an 87 percent completion rate. I hope all of my colleagues will join with me in applauding the Appalachian Trail Conference and the National Park Service for their tremendous dedication to getting the job done.

DR. DONALD MACDONALD BRINGS A SPECIAL PERSPECTIVE TO THE BATTLE AGAINST DRUG ABUSE

HON. C.W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in the 2 years since his appointment as Administrator of the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration, Dr. Donald Macdonald, my good friend and constituent from Pinellas County, FL, has had a tremendous impact on our Nation's battle against drug abuse.

Based upon his family experiences, he has brought to the agency a special perspective to our Nation's drug and alcohol problems. His efforts within the Department of Health and Human Services have been noticed and well received and, as a result, his responsibilities have grown in his new position as Acting Assistant Secretary for Health. In this new role, Dr. Macdonald not only oversees the agency for alcohol and drug abuse, but also the Centers for Disease Control, the National Institutes of Health, and the Food and Drug Administration.

As a member of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Health, I know of the high esteem my colleagues hold for his work and opinions. The New York Times, in a profile yesterday, described Dr. Macdonald's unique qualifications and experiences which help set him apart from others. Following my remarks, I would like to include this profile because it is an example of how one man has taken his tragic experiences, learned from them, educated others, and now is in a position to directly influence Federal policy.

As a friend of Dr. Macdonald and his family for many years prior to his appointment, I have known of the fine qualities which now make him an important part of this administration. I'm pleased that in his current role, all the Nation can now benefit from his knowledge and expertise in these critical areas of public health care.

FOUND: A WARM HEART AMONG THE BUREAUCRATS

(By Jane Gross)

WASHINGTON.—Dr. Donald Ian Macdonald sees no point in containing his delight when the hot line rings in his office and the caller is a member of the Cabinet.

He also cannot imagine disguising the tears that fill his eyes when he talks of his son's recovery from a drug habit or of the similar ordeals of teen-agers he used to treat as a small-town pediatrician.

In a city of starchy bureaucrats, many of them jaded and cool, Dr. Macdonald brings a sense of wonder and emotional openness that has disarmed Government types who were skeptical when President Reagan appointed him two years ago to head the Alcohol, Drug Abuse and Mental Health Administration, a part of the Department of Health and Human Services.

Dr. Macdonald is now serving as Acting Assistant Secretary in charge of the department's Public Health Service, the division that oversees the drug abuse agency, the National Institutes of Health, the Centers For Disease Control and the Food and Drug Administration. And he is said to have made such a mark in Washington that he is on the "short list" of candidates for the permanent post.

"It's been a miraculous sort of life," Dr. Macdonald said one recent afternoon as he reconstructed an unlikely path that took him from an ocean-front pediatric practice in Clearwater, Fla., to a position where he is in charge of a $10 billion budget and 40,000 employees. "I'm like a kid discovering something new all the time."

Until the early 1970's, Dr. Macdonald's life was proceeding smoothly, with his practice flourishing, his four children entering adolescence and his wife active in local Republican political affairs. Then shortly after his 40th birthday, he passed into what he describes as "my male menopause," grew a beard, ditched his coat and tie and tried his hand at sailing and painting.

It was in this self-absorbed episode, Dr. Macdonald continued, that his son Andy, then 15 years old, "got in trouble" and was taken to a psychologist who detected the boy's drug problem. Unknown to his parents, that problem had escalated to a dozen joints of marijuana a day plus alcohol.

"The psychologist said, 'I can't help you because he's stoned,'" Dr. Macdonald recalled.

Andy Macdonald, now a 21-year-old prelaw student at Emory University, spent 10 months in treatment at Straight Inc., a drug-abuse program for adolescents that has spread nationwide from its base in St. Petersburg, Fla.

Stunned by his own ignorance as a parent and physician, and impressed with the Straight program despite periodic contentions that it is coercive, Dr. Macdonald wrote a book about drug abuse, began to concentrate on abuse among his patients and began an intensive tour of the country, lecturing on the subject.

In the process he met, and apparently impressed, Nancy Reagan, who has made drug abuse her White House mandate, and Dr. Carolton E. Turner, President Reagan's deputy assistant for drug abuse policy. They urged Dr. Macdonald's appointment to his first Federal post over the objections of those who doubted his qualifications, including Margaret M. Heckler, then Secretary of Health and Human Services.

Dr. Macdonald understood the objections to his original appointment and even agreed with his detractors that his management experience was limited, as was his background in scientific research, and that his affiliation with Straight had raised the specter that he was a zealot.

"People wondered why I wasn't angry," Dr. Macdonald said, "but everything they were saying was true."

"Now, I feel very comfortable here in having proved myself."

Dr. Macdonald, now 54 years old, brought to his job in Washington some of the lessons he had learned about drug abuse in teen-agers.

"The way to reach kids is not through their rotten behavior," he said. "A kid knows he's a bum. The way to reach a kid is to see pain, sadness, death. When you say, 'You look like you're hurting,' the response is amazing. They look at you like maybe you have something to say to them."

Parents, Dr. Macdonald says, are often harder to reach since a diagnosis of drug abuse seems to carry with it blame. The surest sign of trouble, he discovered, is a mother's response when asked when she last had a good night's sleep.

"You ask that question and they start to cry," Dr. Macdonald said, his own eyes filling at the memory. "They may have no understanding what's going on, but they know when their kid is in difficulty."

As he sits in the assistant secretary's office these days, Dr. Macdonald marvels at the nice things people are saying about him. Fred Coglan, an aide to Dr. Turner, for example, says Dr. Macdonald is a man "with no hidden agendas" and "a smile you can hear over the telephone."

When Dr. Macdonald first moved to his corner suite in the Health and Human Services building in downtown Washington, he regarded himself as "a neutral guy without aspirations," reluctant but dutiful about his temporary post. Then, he says, he felt the bubbling of ambition.

And now he is relaxed and enjoying the opportunity to hobnob with the country's leading scientists and health care experts and to carry out some pet projects, like the encouragement of programs affecting children and the recent appointment of an AID coordinator for the Public Health Service.

"One of the things I've loved seeing in Government is the balance between the amateurs and the pros," Dr. Macdonald said. "This is the way our country was started, by amateurs with high ideals and purpose."

LET'S ADD COMPONENT TO THE SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

HON. PAT WILLIAMS

OF MONTANA

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in the 1st session of the 99th Congress, I was joined by over 80 of my colleagues in cosponsoring H.R. 1090, to add an education component to the Summer Youth Employment Program [SYEP]. Since then, I have incorporated suggestions from hearings on the bill and am reintroducing a new bill. In expanding the existing summer youth employment program this new bill will:

First, provide youth the basic academic and functional competencies,

Second, provide counseling on the connection between skills and job prospects,

Third, involve those who are behind in school in combined work experience and remedial education activities,

Fourth, develop individual remedial strategies for each young person to pursue during the school year,

Fifth, add a 90-percent hold-harmless provision to insure against shifts in allocations,

Sixth, allow those local service delivery areas under the Job Training Partnership Act [JTPA] to participate in this program if they so chose with incentives to do so,

Seventh, ensure that local areas can select and serve those youth in most need of remediation and,

Eighth, permit the operation of SYEP on a year around basis in those service delivery areas whose schools operate on a year around schedule so that youth are not prevented from participation based solely on the basis of what part of the year that they are in school.

This legislation requires no additional Federal dollars and is thus revenue neutral, since it requires that each private industry council [PIC] raise a limited amount of non-Federal funds (1.5 percent of the SYEP allocation) to pay for this effort. These locally raised funds would then be increased by the State from non-Federal sources or from existing Federal funds available to the State under section 202(b)(1) and (3) of JTPA and under chapter 2 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981.

This legislation was developed in response to research findings that:

First, economically disadvantaged youth are likely to experience decay in their achievement scores during the summer;

Second, a significant portion of the difference in learning from year to year between disadvantaged and advantaged youth may occur during the summer;

Third, disadvantaged youth who are behind one grade level or more in school are at-risk of dropping out of school;

Fourth, individualized, self-paced remedial instruction is effective and the preferred approach in reversing these trends with economically disadvantaged youth, and can produce modest and lasting gains in basic academic and functional competency skills; and

Fifth, when achievement scores can be raised during the summer, especially for youth aged 14–15, high school dropout rates may be reduced.

MARCH 1986—NATIONAL EYE DONOR MONTH

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best gift a person can give is a gift of sight. By being an organ or tissue donor, the lives of the suffering are renewed. Thanks to medical advances and increased national awareness of the benefits of organ and tissue donation, last year more than 25,000 Americans were restored to useful vision through corneal transplants.

This procedure has a 95-percent success rate in improving sight and can only be done with donated eye tissue. The procedure helps a wide spectrum of society. In 1985, a 9-day-old infant and a 103-year-old man were given this precious gift and can see today. However, thousands more people without vision could benefit from this operation but are not being helped because of a shortage of eye donations.

A united national effort exists to eliminate this shortage. The 88 eye banks belonging to the Eye Bank Association of America are committed to the goal of having a cornea readily available for anyone suffering from corneal blindness. In 1986, the 25th Anniversary Year of the EBAA, these eye banks are intensifying their work to preserve medical standards of the highest quality, to promote organ and tissue donation, and to encourage research into the prevention and treatment of eye disease and injury.

The major barrier to the elimination of waiting lists for corneal tissue is the lack of public knowledge about organ and tissue donation. In particular, many citizens do not realize that all eye tissue is acceptable for donation, regardless of the donor's age or quality of vision. There is no substitute for human eye tissue. No synthetic cornea currently is effective. Thus eye tissue not suitable for transplant is used for research projects so valuable information can be gained to help the thousands of others with diabetes, glaucoma, retinal disease, and other eye problems.

Therefore, as we in Congress have done the last 3 years, it is fitting that we once again inform the public of the need for eye and tissue donations and encourage more Americans to become organ and tissue donors. By doing so, we designate March 1986 as "National Eye Donor Month" and call on all of our citizens to support this humanitarian cause with appropriate activity.

SILVERSTEINS CELEBRATE 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the happy occasion of Abraham and Jeanette Silverstein's 50th wedding anniversary, which they will celebrate on Saturday, January 25, 1986.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise to record here a very special day in the lives of two wonderful people. The Silversteins are truly a shining example of the institution of marriage: it is an example from which we can all profit.

The Silversteins are now enjoying their retirement in Royal Palm Beach, FL, after residing for many years in Oceanside, NY. Abraham Silverstein was a salesman and buyer in children's wear in New York, and he reached the top of his trade, earning many honors. He was elected the first president of the Fabric Sales Guild, and also served as president of the Piece Goods Buyers Association. Jeanette Silverstein was actively involved in the Oceanside community, including a stint as president of the Oceanside Jewish Center Sisterhood. The Silversteins have three daughters—Carol, Doreen, and Eve—and seven grandchildren.

Mr. Speaker, the story of the Silversteins is a story we can all be proud of, because they are the kind of people who have made America great. I call now on all of my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives to join me in congratulating Abraham and Jeanette Silverstein on this joyous occasion, and in wishing then many more happy years together.

WHITE HOUSE UNCONCERN FOR DOMESTIC OIL INDUSTRY

HON. WES WATKINS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, once again the White House has shown a total unconcern for the ramifications of international conditions on the domestic oil industry. The White House concerns are obviously more deep and compassionate for international money changers and developing countries than it is for one of the most fruitful, and revenue producing, segments of the American economy, an industry whose health is essential to national security and a thriving economy.

Mr. Larry Speakes, as reported in yesterday's Washington Post, said that falling world prices for petroleum are, and I quote, "obviously a problem * * * for all oil-exporting countries and can aggravate the problem of debtor countries." Again, Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration is showing more concern for foreign interests than domestic ones, and independent domestic producers in Oklahoma.

Almost 3 years ago, on February 1, 1983, then Secretary of Treasury Donald Regan, the budget director and the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors appeared before the Appropriations Committee on which I have the honor to serve. At that time, Mr. Regan said that while a reduction in the price of crude from $8 to $10 a barrel would cut the rate of inflation by at least 1 percent, it would add to the gross national product by about another 1 percent. Then he said, "We might have to take extreme measures of one type or another to shore up any failing banks or what have you, because we would not want the oil price drop to precipitate a bank's crisis."

At that time, I asked Mr. Regan if he would be willing to tell the oil producers of Oklahoma, and other oil-producing States, that they can take bankruptcy and belly up like Penn Square Bank did.

Mr. Regan told me that he felt sure that many of the wells drilled in Oklahoma and many of the new wells that will be drilled in the future can be profitable at $25 a barrel. "I see no reason why at $25 a barrel they couldn't be profitable now," he said.

Mr. Speaker, in 1982 the average rig count for Oklahoma was 621.5. that means there was an average of 621.5 rigs exploring for oil or gas, doing workovers, or servicing producing wells. This week, Mr. Speaker, the rig count in Oklahoma is 242.

An $8 to $10 a barrel drop in price means that Oklahoma will lose $88 to $100 million in revenue. A dollar drop in crude price means Oklahoma loses $11 million in revenue. Should the price of crude level off at $20, which is doubtful, Oklahoma will be losing around $6 million a month, or $72 million annually in revenues to the State, the Oklahoma Corporation Commission reports. Federal revenues also decline.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: When the State of Oklahoma's budget, which is a balanced budget by law submitted by the Governor, incidentally, is based on crude oil priced at $23, and the budget is still shy a quarter of a billion dollars, what are we supposed to do?

Can Oklahoma apply to the World Bank or the International Monetary Fund? Can my independent oil producers seek relief through agencies to which, as I understand it, the American taxpayers are making possible 7.25-percent interest?

I told Mr. Regan then, I was shellshocked when he said, in essence, that bankruptcy of the domestic oil industry is good for America because it was good for consumers because of lower prices. If the wells run dry and no new ones are drilled, the consumers will have to rely on insecure and much more costly imported supplies from OPEC. Mr. Speaker, we've been down that road before. I am even further shocked that the only utterance we can get from the White House is their concern for oil-exporting countries and for debtor nations.

Mr. President, your silence concerning the recordbreaking number of bankruptcies and bank closures in the oil patch is deafening.

I ask, how about the oil exporting States, Mr. Speaker, and the thousands of banks that, like Mr. Regan suggested, did not loan full value on crude reserves collateral.

Mr. Speaker, last February I was at the White House while the President pitched us for more support for his military spending. I asked him then, and I ask him again, to endorse an import fee on crude oil and refined products, with the proceeds to retire the national deficit. The policies of this administration are not only ruining the domestic oil industry, they are also causing an unhealthy and extremely hazardous reliance on imported petroleum. Given the tenor of the Mideast * * * with madman Mu'ammar Qadhafi sitting on hair trigger in Libya, who knows what can happen. We know from history what can happen and how long it takes to get petroleum and natural gas from the ground.

The ramifications, Mr. Speaker, of further deterioration of the domestic petroleum industry can make the OPEC embargo of 1973–74 and its effects look like a Sunday school picnic.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest the White House should concern itself with assuring a domestic oil industry for national security purposes than plunging into those bottomless pits where billions and billions of dollars have been spent overseas, usually to create an economy which is in direct competition to U.S. industries. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

HAZEN AWARD FOR EXCELLENCE IN CLINICAL RESEARCH

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to insert into the RECORD an article from the New York Times of November 8 focusing on the seventh annual Lita Annenberg Hazen Awards for Excellence in Clinical Research, administered by the Mount Sinai School of Medicine.

The $100,000 award is presented to a physician and his chosen research fellow, whose investigative studies have changed the medical profession's knowledge and consequent treatment of a disease. The 1985 recipient is Dr. Hugh O'Neill McDevitt of Stanford University, an immunologist and clinical investigator whose scientific achievements have had wide-ranging influence on our thinking about the interrelationships of genetics and the immune system—in particular, the genetic basis for susceptibility of individuals to specific diseases.

A new and more fundamental understanding of immunologically mediated disease processes and significant insights into their prevention have resulted from his original, precise, and scholarly experimentation. Dr. McDevitt's research is creative and his excellence as a mentor is known throughout the medical community.

[From the New York Times, Nov. 8, 1985]

TISSUE RESEARCH WINS AWARD

(By Harold M. Schmeck, Jr.)

Dr. Hugh O. McDevitt of Stanford University, an expert in research on the links between human tissue types and susceptibility to disease, was named winner of the $100,000 Lita Annenberg Hazen Award for excellence in clinical research yesterday.

The award is presented each year to a physician whose research is deemed to have "changed the medical profession's understanding and consequent treatment of disease." Half of each award goes to the winner; the rest is used to support work by a young medical scientist who is chosen by the award winner to join in continuing research.

Dr. McDevitt, an immunologist, was a pioneer in discovering that people who have certain tissue types have heightened susceptibility to a variety of diseases, including rheumatoid arthritis, insulin-dependent diabetes and multiple sclerosis.

"He has been responsible for many of the crucial discoveries that underlie the association between disease and the human leukocyte antigens," the award announcement said. Human leukocyte antigens, substances found on the surfaces of white blood cells, are used to define a tissue type as substances on red blood cells determine blood type.

USED IN ORGAN TRANSPLANTS

While blood types are determined mainly by the presence or absence of four substances, however, tissue types are more complex and depend on at least 80 substances on leukocytes, the white blood cells. The white cells are important in the body's immune defenses.

Antigen types first came to notice when they proved vital to matching a donor and a recipient in organ transplants. Dr. McDevitt and other scientists noticed that people who had certain leukocyte antigen profiles were more likely than others to develop certain diseases that involve malfunction of the immune system. In other cases, a person's type seemed to be associated with heightened resistance to one disease or another.

Dr. James F. Glenn, president of the Mount Sinai Medical Center, chairman of the award committee, said Dr. McDevitt was being honored for research bridging basic and clinical immunology that had "yielded significant insights into the possible prevention or cure of immunologically mediated diseases." The awards are administered by Mount Sinai School of Medicine.

Mr. Speaker, established in 1979 by Mrs. Lita Annenberg Hazen, the award is a reflection of her concern about the steady decline in the number of physicians choosing research over private practice in the United States. With the reduction of Federal funds for biomedical research, private sector funding, such as the award established by Mrs. Hazen, plays an increasingly important role in clinical investigation. We cannot underestimate the importance of cooperation between Government, industry, and the academic research communities in insuring the overall health of American scientific research during these difficult times.

We thank Mrs. Hazen for her wisdom and leadership in creating this award. We congratulate Dr. Hugh O'Neill McDevitt for his elegant research and devotion to teaching, and it gives me great pleasure to share with my colleagues my excitement about the most valuable discoveries that will come from the work made possible by Mrs. Hazen's award.

BALTIC FREEDOM DAY

HON. WILLIAM CARNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today a joint resolution designating June 14, 1986, as "Baltic Freedom Day."

The purpose of this resolution is to set aside a day of remembrance for the continuing plight of the people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, who have endured 46 years of foreign domination and suppression by the Soviet Union.

The United States has never recognized the illegal occupation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union. Our Nation has expressed its outrage over the brutal deportations of thousands of innocent Baltic citizens into Siberia since 1940.

This resolution reaffirms the U.S. policy of nonrecognition of the Soviet takeover of these nations and stresses our continued support of the Baltic states' desire for independence, sovereignty, and freedom.

The resolution introduced today is this body's way of reminding the free world that there are nations and people who, despite 46 years of repression, have not given up hope for freedom. This resolution asks that we in this body remember, and that the President observe Baltic Freedom Day with appropriate actions to commemorate this day. It is a small price to pay for such large principles as human rights and self-determination.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that my colleagues will join with me in cosponsoring this resolution. Let us not miss this opportunity to stand with those who still dare work and hope for freedom in the shadow of Soviet domination.

THE FIGHTING FARMERS, NEW JERSEY FOOTBALL CHAMPIONS

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, some of the finest high school football in the Nation is played in my home State of New Jersey. The spirit of competition and the level of ability are second to none. From the hundreds of teams and thousands of players who engage in interscholastic football competition in New Jersey, the Group IV champion is generally recognized as the strongest team in the State. For the second consecutive year, the Fighting Farmers of Union High School emerged from the season playoffs as the No. 1 rated team in the State, according to the Star-Ledger rating system.

Under Coach Lou Rettino, Union extended its undefeated string to 22 games in capturing the State championship. This winning tradition is not new to Union High School. It has displayed similar achievements in baseball and other sports, and it has kindled a spirit of pride in the school and the community.

The discipline, hard work and desire to succeed that have inspired the players at Union High School will remain with them long after their athletic abilities have waned and the headlines on the sports pages have yellowed. These are qualities that will endure for the rest of their lives.

In a competitive world where the line between winning and losing is very clear, the Union High School players experienced the exhilaration of victory and personal triumph.

They played against some of New Jersey's finest teams, and won their championship game on a field so muddy that it was hard to distinguish the players. Union High School's Farmers not only won the State championship over the opposing Montclair Mounties, but they also defeated the weather and a sea of mud. It was a game that every player will remember.

I wish to congratulate Coach Rettino, the coaching staff and players, ranging from their great running back Tony Stewart, to the substitutes who participated in many practice sessions where there were no crowds to cheer them, but only the pride of being on the team and winning. They richly deserve the No. 1 ranking as New Jersey's best high school football team.

BIRMINGHAM CELEBRATES ITS JEWISH HERITAGE

HON. BEN ERDREICH

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, January 27, 1986, the Birmingham Historical Society will celebrate Jewish Heritage Night, highlighting the many contributions that Jewish Americans have made to the economic and cultural vitality of the city of Birmingham and Jefferson County.

Although Jews make up less than 1 percent of the total population of Birmingham, with their rich heritage and religious beliefs, they have made major contributions to the city's business and civic community.

Business and civic leadership involvement led the Jews of Birmingham to be highly active in our county, and through the years they have served with distinction on many of the city's boards, councils, and commissions.

The Jewish community in Birmingham is rich in religious heritage, with Reform Judaism dominating as the primary tradition practiced at Temple Emanu-El prior to 1889. After that time, the quickly growing number of Jews from Europe and Russia who settled in Birmingham led to the establishment of an Orthodox congregation that came to be known as K'nesseth Israel, or Assembly of Israel. Temple Beth-El, with its mix of both a modern and traditional congregation, was established in 1907 and provided Jews from all religious and cultural backgrounds the opportunity to participate in synagogue life.

As strong supporters of economic growth and community fellowship through their active participation in business, education, the arts, and philanthropy, Birmingham's Jewish citizens have greatly enriched the city and the lives of all those who live there. I would like to congratulate all those participating in "Jewish Heritage Night," particularly the members of the Birmingham Historical Society, for their continuing recognition of the many ethnic groups and traditions that have made Birmingham the great city that it is.

IMMIGRATION REFORM LEGISLATION

HON. THOMAS N. KINDNESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, a front page story in today's New York Times reports that the President's Council of Economic Advisors will soon issue a report warning that proposals to punish employers of illegal aliens would have adverse effects on the Nation's economy. I ask that the article be included in the RECORD.

Most of us know that employer sanctions were a centerpiece of the immigration bill which the House passed last Congress; they will be included in the immigration reform legislation which the Senate passed in this Congress and which waits House action.

I agree with the draft report's assertion that employer sanctions are a faulted idea, but the sanctions themselves are only part of the picture.

What this news article did not discuss is the unfair burden the bill would place on the Nation's employers by charging them with the duty of policing the work force. The immigration bill pending before the House would require detailed recordkeeping by all employers—large and small, no exceptions—even if they don't come within 300 miles of an illegal alien and even if they have never hired an illegal.

I doubt that this additional Government regulation would accomplish anything other than headaches for employers and increased costs to the Immigration Service for processing all the new paperwork. Costs, I might add, that would be better spent policing our borders.

The time has come to take a look at this issue from another angle. Surely we can resolve the illegal immigration problem without burying employers, particularly those with small businesses, under an ocean of paperwork.

REAGAN'S ADVISERS SAY BILL ON ALIENS CAN HURT ECONOMY

PENALTY PROPOSAL CITED

Report says fining employers of illegal immigrants would be labor market tax

(By Robert Pear)

WASHINGTON.—President Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers warns in a new report that proposals to punish employers of illegal aliens would have adverse effects on the nation's economy.

Imposing sanctions on employers for hiring illegal aliens would reduce the national output of goods and services and would impose a new labor market tax on employers, the council says in a confidential draft of its 1986 report, to be submitted to Congress in early February.

The report undermines the rationale for a comprehensive immigration bill designed to curtail the influx of illegal aliens by imposing penalties on employers who hire them. In the past, the Reagan Administration has supported such bills, including one passed by the Senate last September and awaiting action in the House.

RESTRICTIONS ARE COSTLY

But the Council of Economic Advisers said in a draft report that restrictions on immigration like restrictions on trade, are costly to employers and to the economy as a whole.

The report estimated that it would cost employers $1.6 billion to $2.6 billion a year to screen job applicants and weed out illegal aliens. The council did not give the basis for this estimate, which it called conservative.

The draft report, obtained today from a White House official, said there was no firm evidence that illegal aliens displaced native-born workers from jobs in the United States. The number of jobs is not fixed, the report said, adding that alien workers contributed to an overall economic expansion whose benefits were "widely diffused," in the form of lower prices, new job opportunities and higher profits for investors.

OUTPUT SAID TO BE INCREASED

The report concluded that immigration to the United States increased total employment and output in this country as well as the per-capita income of the native-born population. Conversely, it said, employer sanctions "would reduce employment and output."

The study generally does not distinguish between legal and illegal aliens in assessing their effects on the economy. It is nearly impossible to draw such distinctions from the available evidence, which suggests that the two groups affect labor markets in similar ways, the report said.

The main function of the Council of Economic Advisers, established in 1946, is to advise the President on economic developments.

Members of Congress have not yet received or read the report, so it is difficult to gauge its impact. However, the document appears likely to impede progress on the immigration bill, which is awaiting action in the House Judiciary Committee. The bill is sponsored by Representatives Peter W. Rodino Jr. of New Jersey and Romano L. Mazzoli of Kentucky, both Democrats. The Senate bill is sponsored by Senator Alan K. Simpson, Republican of Wyoming.

The report also seems certain to strengthen the hand of critics of the legislation, including Hispanic groups and farmers who have resisted tighter controls on immigration.

Albert R. Brashear, a White House spokesman, declined to comment on the report. "We don't generally comment on documents before they are released," he said.

Other Administration officials said the report reflected the views of Beryl W. Sprinkel, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers. Confidential minutes of Domestic Policy Council meetings over the last six months show that Mr. Sprinkel has expressed similar views in that forum, challenging the "fundamental premises" of the Senate and House bills. But to date no member of the Reagan Administration has publicly expressed such doubts.

The Domestic Policy Council is an advisory body composed of Cabinet officers.

The draft report said that Americans who competed directly with immigrant labor might experience "job losses or wage reductions." Such losses, although "more visible than the economic gains," are outweighed by the overall increase in national output, which "increases the per capita income of the native-born U.S. population," the report said. In addition, it said, "The work of immigrants reduces the prices of domestically produced goods."

FARMERS HELPED BY ALIENS

The presence of low-skilled foreign workers in the United States "enables domestic business enterprises to produce goods profitably that would not otherwise have been produced here," the report said.

For example, it said the availability of alien workers had helped American farmers compete with their counterparts in other countries. Restricting the supply of alien farm labor would "increase the costs of farm production," it said.

In addition, the report said aliens often helped Americans perform their work more efficiently. "A scientist is more productive if there are assistants to wash the test tubes and type manuscripts," it said. "A worker with family responsibilities is more productive if there are others in the household to help with child care."

The House bill would require employers to ask all job applicants for identification documents to verify that they were United States citizens or aliens authorized to work in this country. Employers would be subject to civil penalties of $1,000 to $5,000 for each illegal alien hired. The Senate bill also provides for civil penalties.

COST TO EMPLOYERS ASSAILED

The economic report said: "The imposition of screening and record-keeping obligations, along with penalties for noncompliance, imposes costs on employers and employment agencies. These costs are the equivalent of a labor market tax. Such a tax falls on both legal and illegal workers. The most adverse employment effects are on workers with low skill levels, particularly on youths and minorities."

"To the extent that sanctions are effective in barring illegal aliens from employment, aggregate income and output will also be reduced," the report said.

TRADE ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE EXTENSION

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to extend trade adjustment assistance, an important program which was allowed to expire when the first session of the 99th Congress adjourned in December.

My home State of Maine has been seriously hurt by the flow of foreign imports into our country, particularly in the shoe industry. For workers who have lost their jobs as a result of foreign imports, the Trade Adjustment Assistance Program is a valuable source of vocational retraining, job search and relocation, and temporary financial assistance.

While the continuing resolution for fiscal 1986 extended funding for the training and job search portion of the Trade Adjustment Assistance Program, the weekly benefits were allowed to lapse. As a result, 458 people in Maine, and nearly 10,000 beneficiaries nationwide, had their weekly trade readjustment allowance [TRA] benefits cut off in December. This serious omission is one which must be corrected immediately.

Maine has made great strides in establishing programs to help dislocated shoeworkers and other dislocated workers make the difficult transition from the loss of a career to successful employment in a new field. Through counseling, education, job training, and job search assistance, Maine's dislocated workers are reentering the workplace.

However, for dislocated workers to spend time in school or other training, they need the monetary assistance provided by TRA weekly benefits. By allowing these benefits to be cut off, we fail to provide an incentive to workers to seek the assistance they need to reenter the job market. In essence, we are making the adjustment trade adjustment assistance intends to facilitate nearly unattainable.

The bill I am introducing is a simple extension. It will reauthorize the Trade Adjustment Assistance Program through September 30, 1989, making weekly benefits retroactive to December 19, 1985 when they were allowed to expire. No other changes will be made by this measure.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the extension of the Trade Adjustment Assistance Program. Supporting this program is the very least we can do to show concern for America's workers who have lost their jobs because of the importation of foreign products.

IDIOSYNCRASIES OF FALL RIVER, MA

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, one of the best, most interesting and freshest thinking journalists in Massachusetts is Bob Kerr who works for the Providence Journal. For several years now, Bob Kerr has been covering the city of Fall River. He has recently been transferred to other duties by the Journal, and one of his recent columns was a tribute to that very diverse and vibrant city. It's an excellent example of Bob Kerr's first-rate writing, and an excellent testimony as well to a great city.

The article follows:

[From the Providence Journal, Jan. 6, 1986]

A GUIDE TO FALL RIVER FOR THOSE WHO LOVE ITS IDIOSYNCRASIES

(By Bob Kerr)

The question will always come, I guess. Old acquaintances from other places often ease into it with, "Fall River? That place with all the old mills on the way to the Cape? That's where you live?"

Not-so-old acquaintances with not so-distant addresses are more scathing, some times scatological, in passing judgment on my decision to live where I live.

I'm getting tired of the defense because there really shouldn't have to be one. Those who don't understand will never understand because they won't take the time to go into the rich little corners of the city and find the people who make it the wonderfully rough-edged, warm, funny, sometimes bizarre place it is.

They'll never meet Louis Sanft, who delivers Italian cookies on Christmas Eve and whom I had the honor of watching wrap up his 200th hour of hairstyling to mark the Bicentennial.

They'll never climb to the fourth floor of the Police Athletic League, on Franklin Street, and watch Libby Medeiros, a construction worker with a lot of patience, teach kids to box and throw in a few basic lessons on matters beyond the ring.

They'll never visit the big stone house on Rock Street and be charmed off their narrow-minded pins by Florence Brigham, the lady who preserves local history with a style not to be matched.

They'll never go to Billy's Cafe for a chourico sandwich and enough atmosphere to outlive a dozen fern bars.

They'll never have a lime rickey at Main Drug.

They'll never talk to a lady who has helped clothe thousands through her incredible ability to run miles of cloth through a power sewing machine.

They'll never watch the Durfee High School basketball team win yet another state championship.

They'll never talk to the wonderful couple who run the soup kitchen in the south end.

They'll never have a kielbasa plate at the Ukrainian Club.

They'll never laugh at a BMW.

They'll never go to that madcap city hall with the highway in the basement.

They'll never settle down with morning coffee and a radio talk show and marvel at the incredible local store of inventive opinion.

They'll never hang out on North Main, near Franklin, at noontime. They'll never hear Tommy Tanous play the trumpet or tell stories.

If I had the tour concession, I'd start at Jerry's Lodgings, on North Main Street, with a few words from Jerry Lawton, proprietor and champion of the mentally ill, who has given a home a dozens of people who have nowhere else to go.

Then, I'd pass the mike to my friend, Richard Thibault, who would talk about the simple joys of freedom after years of living in a mental hospital.

After picking up the obligatory sweaters at a mill outlet, some Portuguese sweet bread at a Columbia Street bakery and a chicken pie at Plourde's Bakery, on North Main Street, the tour would move on to the Belmont Club, a three-star standout in the regional quaffing guide.

A guy named Paul would talk about the New York Giants; a guy named Tommy would evenly sprinkle insults from behind the bar; and a guy named Dan would list the sins of the news media, all in the course of three frosty rounds.

We'd hit a few gorgeous churches, swing by the house on Second Street where Lizzie Borden did or did not fillet her parents with an ax, and then stop for some Portuguese food at one of half a dozen spicy choices.

We'd go "Up The Flint," "Down North" and "Out The Globe." We'd run some red lights.

Anyone wanting to leave the bus could do so on request. But they could never get back on. Like it or leave it. But don't knock it 'til you've tried it.

CREDIT CARD INTEREST RATE DISCLOSURE

HON. TOBY ROTH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, Americans are daily being deluged with offers of credit cards. For the price of a stamp, a person can return a preapproved "application" and receive a credit line, immediate cash, travel insurance, and a host of extras certain to enhance the individual's prestige—and indebtedness.

Frequently, these applications are accompanied by full-color brochures and a friendly letter from the president of the institution offering the credit. There is, unfortunately, one item that is difficult to find in the attractive advertising. That is the cost of the credit card to the consumer.

To address this problem, on January 21, I introduced H.R. 4019, the Credit Card Interest Rate and Cost Disclosure Act of 1986.

Recent hearings before the Banking Committee's Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs and Coinage, of which I am a member, shed a great deal of light on the issue of credit card interest rates. Since 1981, the prime interest rate has declined to 9.5 percent. Fixed rate mortgages can now be had for under 12.5 percent. Personal loans are frequently available at a rate of less than 16 percent.

A recent Federal Reserve Board study, however, shows that credit card interest rates average 18.6 percent. Most of the largest credit card issuers have rates which exceed 19.5 percent. Thus, credit card interest rates exceed by more than 10 percent the cost of money to the financial institutions which offer them.

This year alone, Americans will pay $6 billion in interest on their credit card accounts on top of $3 billion they will pay in annual fees. If credit card rates were just 1½ percentage points lower—the same rate they were in 1980—consumers would save $700 million in interest charges.

The most obvious solution to the problem of high credit card interest rates is to set a cap on them. While an attractive idea on the surface, a rate ceiling has a number of serious drawbacks.

First, credit card issuers may begin limiting the availability of credit to only the lowest risks. Many people who deserve credit might well be denied it. Grace periods for paying unpaid balances interest-free might well be eliminated.

Second, if the profitability of credit cards slips to low levels, the issuer could shift costs to other types of loans or services. Thus, consumers may not be net beneficiaries of mandatory reductions in credit card rates.

The solution to the problem of high credit card interest rates is not an arbitrary cap. The key is improved marketplace competition. But marketplace competition is strangely lacking.

Although there are thousands of banks, savings and loans, credit unions, and retailers offering credit cards, interest rates are not coming down across the board.

Competition does not work when the seller is the price setter and the consumer the price taker. A large number of sellers does not guarantee a wide range of choices.

Lending rates are set arbitrarily by card issuers because the consumer is unable to judge with certainty the true cost of a product to compare it to similar products. Many people are unaware, for example, that all MasterCards do not carry the same rates of interest.

And many credit cards are not marketed on the basis of their cost to the consumer. The fact is that information concerning finance charges and fees is virtually hidden from view on many credit card solicitations.

In addition, most people are unaware that they pay the interest rate allowed in the State where the credit card company is located, not the rate allowed for institutions within the State in which they reside.

As the availability of credit grows in our society and the amount of consumer indebtedness grows, we must protect credit card users. An informed public is the best assurance that the marketplace will work effectively. Consumers can't make informed choices without access to all the appropriate information.

A recent survey by one of our colleagues indicated that there are financial institutions which offer credit card interest rates below the national average. I have no doubt that their interest rate is one of their prime selling points. But an institution which issued a credit card carrying a 19.8-percent rate and a large annual fee is much less likely to point with pride to the cost of its product. Unfortunately, most of this country's largest credit card issuers charge the highest fees.

The legislation I am introducing today would amend the Truth in Lending Act to require that any application or preapproved application for credit display prominently the conditions of credit. Those conditions include the annual percentage rate and finance charge, annual or other charges or fees, and whether there is an interest-free grace period. To the greatest possible extent, this information must be contained in an easy-to-read table.

Cost is but one item to consider in selecting an appropriate credit card. For some, card holder services are most important. But for the large percentage of credit card users, cost is major consideration.

Until credit card consumers become more selective and careful, there will be those who will satisfy their demand for credit, at whatever the price. We can give the consumer the tools needed to make an informed decision. This legislation will help consumers shop around for the best credit card terms they can get. It will help give the consumer a better idea of the true cost of going into debt.

OIL PRICES: A MIXED BLESSING

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all have been following the rapid decline in the price of crude oil both on the international and domestic markets. Here in the United States, as late as November of last year, the price of west Texas intermediate crude was $32 a barrel; now it is selling for as low as $20 per barrel on the spot market. This is a mixed blessing. For many motorists and home heating oil customers, this may result in lower fuel prices. However, it also spells potential disaster for the economies of the oilpatch States of Texas, Oklahoma, and Louisiana.

This situation does not bode well for both my home State of Texas and my home city of Houston. Analysis has shown that now that oil is selling at below $25 per barrel, every $1 drop below that price will cost Texas 25,000 jobs and millions of dollars in lost revenue. The economy of the city of Houston has been in decline for over 3 years now. I am fearful of what a collapse in domestic oil prices could do to my city.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a story that appeared on the Associated Press newswire yesterday. It illustrates the horrific impact a large decline in crude oil prices could have on the economy of Texas and other oil-producing States.

NAIL BITING TIME FOR OIL DEPENDENT STATES

DALLAS.—The oil price plunge on the spot market has sent shivers through state officials in oil producing areas who may find themselves millions of dollars short in their state budgets.

Texas, for example, planned on oil being at $25 a barrel this year, and each $1 drop below that means the loss of 25,000 jobs, $100 million in tax revenue and $3 billion in gross state product, according to the state comptroller's office.

Oil on the spot market was trading Wednesday at less than $21 a barrel.

"We're just getting over the shock of seeing that $20 price on the spot market and looking with super concern at what's happening," said Tony Proffitt, tax information director in the comptroller's office.

A sustained price of $20 on the contract, on "posted price," market, where 95 percent of the oil business in Texas takes place, could mean a "devastating" loss of $750 million from Texas' $22 billion biennium budget, Proffitt said Wednesday, "and $15 would be a real deal, a real deal."

The story is the same throughout the oilpatch.

Louisiana was expecting a $150 million budget deficit with oil at $24 a barrel, and will lose an additional $50 million in tax revenue for every $1 below that, Mark Drennan, the Louisiana legislature's chief fiscal officer, told lawmakers Tuesday.

If the price continues to drop, Drennan said, more budget cuts will have to be made, and the impact will begin to be felt as early as February and March tax collections.

State economists in Alaska say every $1 drop costs the state $150 million in lost revenue, but recent price reductions have not substantially affected the state's economy.

And Oklahoma, which planned on an average price of $23 a barrel, stands to lose $33 million in tax revenue if the price drops to $20 or below, said Gov. George Nigh, who has pledged there will be no tax increases.

The price declines were accelerated by slack demand and increased output in recent months, leaving prices 18 percent lower in one week and 35 percent since November. Analysts say prices could drop below $20 a barrel if OPEC countries continue to aggressively chase market share.

One week ago a barrel of West Texas Intermediate, a major U.S. benchmark, cost $25.15 on the spot market, where surplus oil is sold on demand. The spot price closed Tuesday at $20.10. In November it has been $32.

Officials say the drop in prices on the spot market won't immediately translate into a major decline in the oilpatch since most transactions are done on contracts.

But the spot market decline may be a bad omen, they said.

"This could be either a mild shower or a very big rain storm. The clouds are right out there," said Proffitt. "Our concern now is what happens if all this spills over onto the contract market."

Prices on the contract market are still about $25 per barrel, Proffitt said, although Citgo Petroleum Corp. announced this week it was dropping the price it would pay for West Texas Intermediate by $1 to $24.50 a barrel.

Texas actually won't have to settle its state budget dilemma until the end of the currect budget Aug. 31, 1987, when tax increases or budget cutbacks might have to be made to account for lost oil-related revenue.

But Royal Lyson will feel the effects next month.

Lyson, regional sales manager for the N.L. McCullough Co., an oil field service firm in Midland, the heart of western Texas' oil-rich Permian Basin, said Wednesday he has already heard from nervous customers who have decided to postpone drilling because of the price drops.

At $20 a barrel, most independents would stop drilling and McCullough might lose 50 percent of its business, Lyson said. A price of $15 a barrel "would probably bankrupt us."

"It's nail-biting time," he said.

Officials say the price decline's effect on unemployment in oil-producing areas is hard to guage since unemployed workers may pack up and move to areas with more opportunity.

More than 65,000 people were employed in the Oklahoma oil and natural gas industry last December, when unemployment in the state was 7.1 percent. But Wayne Hugus of the state's Employment Security Commission said officials know only that sustained decline "would definitely increase unemployment."

California has 41,000 workers in the oil business, and Texas, where December unemployment was 6.8 percent, has already absorbed declines in the energy industry, U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics economist Nic Santangelo.

If the price falls to $20 for long periods, he said, employment in Texas "goes down through the bottom."

And at $15, "you might as well roll Texas up and put it away."

IN PRAISE OF SPAIN'S FORMAL RECOGNITION OF ISRAEL

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, on January 17, Spain formally recognized Israel. As one who actively worked to see these two nations formalize their relationship, I applaud both Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez and Prime Minister Shimon Peres for their efforts to bring about this recognition.

In many ways, Spain is very similar to Israel. Both nations have emerged as prominent international forces on the strength of their people and their traditions. Each nation has struggled to achieve and maintain democracy, and in each, political debate is lively. Such debate is more than a function of the democratic process in Israel and Spain—it is a way of life.

Since 1982, Israel has had an informal mission in Spain. The two nations have had a number of cultural, scientific, and economic contacts. The January 17 agreement is the fruition of the growing relationship between Israel and Spain.

The whole question of diplomatic ties between the two nations has also been of personal interest to me. I can trace my ancestors back to Spain, and I grew up in a neighborhood populated by Jewish immigrants. In addition, the Jewish-American and Hispanic-American communities have a solid relationship. I have a bond with both cultures. Many of the members of the congressional Hispanic caucus, which I had the pleasure of chairing for 4 years, have visited Israel. In fact, the caucus sent a letter to Prime Minister Gonzalez in 1983, asking that Spain recognize Israel. I would like to briefly quote that letter, which accurately reflects my feelings on the subject of Spain's recognition of Israel:

DEAR MR. PRIME MINISTER: Your recent election signifies a positive change for the people and government of Spain. It serves to emphasize the total emergence of Spain as a full, democratic partner in the community of nations.

As such, the political and diplomatic role of Spain has become increasingly important. We, therefore, request that your government review its present diplomatic situation with Israel. Since Spain maintains open relations with many nations regardless of their political perspective, it does not seem unreasonable to hope that your government would seriously consider having formal diplomatic relations with Israel.

The special relationship between Israel and the United States is well known, and the world is also becoming more aware of the growing influence of Spain in international affairs. Also, your country's unique heritage and geographical location put it in a position to act as a conduit between the Arab world and Israel. Any lessening of tension among these nations would be in the interest of not only the nations involved, and the United States, but of all nations dedicated to seeking peace in the Middle East.

I spoke to the Prime Minister and members of his cabinet several times about the question of diplomatic recognition of Israel. They always assured me that it would happen when the time was right. The Prime Minister is a man of his word.

Finally, as Foreign Minister Yitzak Shamir of Israel said about the recognition, "We congratulate the Spanish Government, and we hope that we will be able to develop meaningful relations in the diplomatic, economic, and cultural spheres." I too congratulate the people and government of both nations. It is also my hope and belief that this is the beginning of a long and meaningful relationship between the two nations.

TRIBUTE TO ED COYLE

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the retirement from active public service of Mr. Edward F. Coyle, a distinguished community leader of Burlington County, NJ, part of my First Congressional District.

Ed Coyle has served Burlington County with honor and distinction for over 60 years.

As chairman of the Riverside Democratic Committee for 25 years, Ed Coyle helped lead our party through times of depression and war, prosperity and peace.

He was a cofounder of the Riverside Franklin Delano Roosevelt Democratic Club, a community based, grassroots organization that has encouraged enthusiastic participation in the democratic process.

Ed's strong leadership has been overshadowed only by his sincere concern for people and the community of Riverside. For the last 56 years Ed has been a member of the Riverside Fire Company and served on the Riverside Sewerage Authority Board of Commissioners.

Ed also served Burlington County as its treasurer for almost a decade.

On the occasion of his retirement after 6 years of tireless, dedicated service to the Riverside Township Committee and the people of Riverside, Ed's friends are hosting a tribute on February 2, 1986, at the Knights of Columbus Hall in Delran, NJ.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure my colleagues would be pleased to join me in honoring Ed Coyle for his commitment and service to Burlington County and its people.

THE 20TH ANNIVERSARY OF DECLARATION OF FREEDOM

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 20th anniversary of a great Declaration of Freedom by 1,500 Cuban exiles who loved their homeland and who today are as committed as they were at Key West, FL, in 1966 to seeing the beautiful isle of Cuba released from the tyranny of Castro. In their Declaration of Freedom, these brave individuals dedicated themselves unequivocally to continuing their fight for democracy in Cuba and their dedication to this cause is still strong. Their ideals of freedom of worship, freedom of teaching, freedom of the press, and free enterprise for all the people of Cuba are ideals which we, as Americans, strongly share. I ask, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the Declaration of Freedom, signed in Key West, FL, on January 23, 1966, by 1,500 dedicated men and women who longed to return to their fatherland and to see their fatherland a free, democratic Cuba once again be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD following these remarks:

The declaration follows:

DECLARATION OF FREEDOM

In the City of Key West, Monroe County, State of Florida, United States of America, we, the Cuban exiles in the United States, in the name of God Almighty, and speaking both for ourselves and the oppressed people in Cuba, the Martyr Island, do say:

That on January 1st, 1959, the slavery yoke that came from Europe and was extinguished in Cuba at the end of the 19th century, was resumed.

That those responsible for this high treason to our Fatherland and to our People are just a score of traitors who, usurpating the Government of the Country have been acting as mercenary agents for the Sino-Soviet imperialism, and have surrendered to that imperialism our Freedom and our Dignity, also betraying the American Hemisphere.

That as a consequence of this high treason, those who are usurpating the Power in Cuba (as they were never elected by the People), are imposing a regime of bloodshed, terror and hate without any respect or consideration to the dignity of the human being or the most elementary human rights.

That in their hunger for Power, these traitors, following the pattern of totalitarian regimes, are trying, within Cuba, to separate the Family, which is the cornerstone of actual society, and at the same time, are poisoning the minds of the Cuban children and youth, in their hope of extending the length of time for this abominable system.

That the rule of the Law has been wiped out in Cuba, and it has been replaced by the evil will of this score of traitors, who are acting under orders from their masters, the Sino-Soviet imperialists.

In view of the aforegoing,

WE DECLARE

First: That the actual Cuban regime is guilty of high treason to our Fatherland and to the ideals of the Freedom revolution which was started on October 10th, 1868.

Second: That this score of traitors who have committed treason against our Fatherland, in case they survive the downfall of their regime, will have to respond, even with their lives before the Ordinary Courts of Justice of Cuba.

Third: That as the Noble Cuban People will not ever surrender, because that Nation was not born to be slaves, we, the Cuban People, hereby make the present.

DECLARATION OF FREEDOM

We hereby swear before God Almighty to fight constantly, until death comes to us, to free Cuba from communism.

The fundamentals of this Revolution for Freedom are:

First: God almighty, above all things, in Whom we believe as the essence of Life.

Second: The Fatherland, with all of its Laws, traditions, customs and history as a spiritual value, only surpassed by the concept of God.

Third: The Family, as the cornerstone of the Human Society.

Fourth: Human Rights, for each and every citizen, regardless of race or creed.

Fifth: The Law, as the foundation for the proper development of the Human Society.

Sixth: Democratic Government, with its three independent branches: Legislative, Executive and Judicial.

Seventh: Representative Democracy, through the exercise of Universal Suffrage, Periodically, Free and Secretive, as the expression of Popular Sovereignty.

Eighth: Freedom of Worship, Freedom of Teaching, Freedom of the Press and Free Enterprise.

Ninth: Private Property and Ownership, as the basic expression of Liberty.

Tenth: The improvement of living conditions for both rural and city working masses, with the just and necessary measures, keeping in mind the Legitimate interests of both Labor and Capital.

Eleventh: The derogation and eradication of anything which is opposed to the political and religious fundamentals aforementioned, and specifically, the abolition of Communism and any other form of totalitarian manifestation.

Signed and sealed in Key West, Florida, on the 23rd day of January, 1966.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. BILL ALEXANDER

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, because of official business I was unavoidably absent during the vote on final passage of H.R. 2443, the Expedited Funds Availability Act. I support the legislation, and had I been present I would have voted "aye."

BILL TO CORRECT AN INJUSTICE

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I am joined today by my colleague, Mr. BARTON, introducing a bill which, I hope and trust, will draw overwhelming support from my colleagues. It concerns an issue that has been brought to the floor of this House time and time again—abortion.

Under current tax law, a parent whose child is the object of an abortion may be claimed as a dependent by that parent if the child survives; even if he only takes a single breath. This, to my mind, is a terrible and repugnant loophole in the law. It is evident that the taxpayer who chooses to abort his or her child does not want to, or feels that he or she cannot, contribute to the support of that child if it were born. How can we then allow the "dreaded complication," the brief and often painful life of an aborted baby, to become a "fringe benefit."

Though many may argue that a fetus is not alive before it is born, few would deny that abortion prevents human life, whether by ending it or preventing its inception. The parent who chooses abortion, whether for social, economic, or other reasons, does not want the child to live. The final decision was to abort. I do not believe we should degrade that child's brief life by putting a price on it.

Our proposal will prohibit a taxpayer from claiming his child who is born alive after an induced abortion, and who subsequently dies as a result, as a dependent.

Furthermore, this bill will correct another related injustice by no longer allowing a taxpayer who has intentionally killed or substantially contributed to the death of his spouse or child to claim such person as a dependent.

Finally, it will stop implicit back-door funding of abortion by prohibiting the inclusion of abortion services as deductible medical care. If we as a body and as representative of the people of the United States do not believe in supporting or promoting abortion as an acceptable method of family planning in our health care and health insurance programs, we should not subsidize it indirectly by allowing those able to pay for abortions to deduct those expenses from their taxable income.

Mr. Speaker, the Hyde amendment calls for an end to taxpayer funding of abortion in all its forms. Common sense calls for an end to these other injustices.

VILLAGE OF ROSEMONT, IL, CELEBRATES 30TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, January 20, 1986, the village of Rosemont, IL, observed 30 years of incorporation as a village: Three decades of phenomenal growth and progress that has helped Illinois become an important center of business and tourism.

The village of Rosemont is a textbook example of a spirited community working together to create a town run like our country's most successful businesses: Efficient operation, steady growth, team effort toward clearly delineated goals.

Rosemont's wide variety of operations run efficiently and profitably because of the total involvement of village residents. Through the years, each resident has contributed his or her own time and talents to the continued progress of the village.

We salute Mayor Donald E. Stephens and the people of Rosemont Village Hall: Trustees Lorraine Clemmensen, Anthony D. Esposito, Hubert Langer, Emmett Michaels, Steven Minale, and Leslie Scott; and Village Clerk Irene Kolaski. Other dedicated personnel at Rosemont Village Hall include Deputy Mayor Donald E. Stephens II, Finance Officer Ray Gold, Deputy Clerk Frances Stevens, Finance Clerk Lee Doberton, Purchasing Coordinator August Sansone, Health and License Officer Joe Rizzo, Executive Secretary Gail Stephens, Clerk Rosalie Lennstrom, and Receptionist Isabelle Seib.

At Rosemont/O'Hare Exposition Center, Managing Director James Freeman and Peter Lombardi, executive director of the Rosemont/O'Hare Convention Bureau, bring important, income-producing trade shows to Rosemont. With the help of Jeff Mahnke of Rosemont Catering Services, and David Houston, president/general manager of Rosemont Exposition Services, exposition manager and business travelers receive top-drawer attention.

Rosemont's Public Safety Department helps maintain order and safety for the 18,000 business people and tourists who visit Rosemont each day. Jack Hasselberger, director and chief of patrol; Gary Hopkins, deputy director and fire chief; and Mel Ramones, captain in charge of special services, coordinate these efforts. Tom Clinger, captain in charge of patrol division and Lt. Roy Evans of the services division, lend their talents. Rosemont's considerable traffic and crowds are controlled by the Rosemont Public Safety Auxiliary Department, under Lt. Jack Geren. Vito Corriero directs a public works department that keeps Rosemont streets clean and clear for visitors.

In serving its visitors, Rosemont does not forget its residents. Rosemont is a town that reveres its senior citizens and schoolchildren. Residents enjoy a park district that provides activities for young and old throughout the year, under the leadership of Robert Thompson and Robert Koehler. Dr. Frank Tavano, superintendent of Rosemont Elementary School, heads a staff of dedicated professionals who provide Rosemont schoolchildren with the tools for tomorrow.

But Rosemont refuses to rest on its laurels. Not content with already outstanding accomplishments in business, tourism, and civics, the village of Rosemont presses on in realizing the potential of this tiny parcel of land adjacent to the world's busiest airport, O'Hare International.

Late last year, Mayor Donald Stephens and the village trustees announced a $500 million, 100-acre redevelopment project for Rosemont.

The program includes 10 major construction projects scheduled for completion in 1987. Among these projects are nine office building, comprising 9 million square feet; four world-class hotels, a unique 7,000 linear foot skybridge system, which will be the first of its kind in the Nation to connect a major exposition center with fine hotels and parking facilities; a performing arts theatre; a 4,458-car garage; a new church; a new 12,000 square foot fire station; and a 100,000 square foot addition to the Rosemont/O'Hare Exposition Center. This addition will bring the Expo Center's total square footage to 450,000 square feet on two levels, making the center the 11th largest exposition facility in the Nation.

This construction further solidifies Rosemont's position as the premier location for business, meetings, and conventions, and travel. Rosemont already is home to nine of the world's most prestigious hotels; the Rosemont Horizon, a 19,000-seat sports, music, and entertainment venue; the spacious Rosemont/O'Hare Exposition Center; and the versatile meeting facility, the Rosemont/O'Hare Conference Center.

Mr. Speaker, it is not often that we can point to a community so alive with dreams and the vitality to reach them. We commend Mayor Donald E. Stephens and the residents of Rosemont. Their self-sufficiency and creativity is a symbol of America at its most industrious. We of the House of Representatives congratulate Rosemont for 30 years of success, and we wish them a bright future.

A TRIBUTE TO DR. ALFRED B. VUOCOLO

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, a high honor has been paid to a family friend, who has been invested as a Knight of Malta. The individual I am paying tribute to is Dr. Alfred B. Vuocolo, a native of Jersey City, who received the award from His Eminence John Cardinal O'Connor at ceremonies held at St. Patrick's Cathedral on Friday, January 17, 1986.

Dr. Vuocolo, age 60, retired last October, due to illness, as chief executive officer for the New Jersey State Forensic Psychiatric Hospital in Trenton.

The award is the highest layman honor in the Catholic religion and dates back to the year 1113 and was approved as a religious order, the Hospitalers of St. John by Pope Pascal II. The order principally is in hospital work and included knights, and chaplains among its members. Its headquarters have been located in Rome since 1834 with sovereign status embodied in a new constitution in 1961. Malta is still an independent country. The religious aspects of the order are subject to regulations by the Pope.

Dr. Vuocolo is being honored for his service in the mental health field, beginning in 1950, at the Menlo Park Diagnostic Center, where he was a psychiatric social worker. A few years later, at the request of Gov. Richard J. Hughes, Dr. Vuocolo planned and designed the New Jersey State Department of Corrections State Training School for Boys at Skillman, NJ, providing counseling and rehabilitation for boys ages 6 through 13 years who were involved with the criminal justice system. He served as its first director for 25 years. The boys' facility was a pilot program described "as the first and the best in the Nation" by Governor Hughes.

In 1983, at the request of Gov. Thomas H. Kean, he began planning for the new psychiatric hospital known as the Vroom Building, which houses 180 maximum security cells for the criminally insane. Groundbreaking for the $12.5 million separate forensic facility to replace the 68-year-old Vroom Building is scheduled for this year, calling for a 100 bed, 65,000 square foot, facility located near the current Vroom Building site.

At a testimonial dinner in his honor last month, Vuocolo was praised by New Jersey Human Services Acting Commissioner Geoffrey S. Perselay, "for his contribution in bringing this facility into the forefront of state hospitals serving the mentally ill. His outstanding work treating each individual under his jurisdiction for the past 35 years with dignity and respect has truly been outstanding." More than 500 friends and officials attended the tribute.

The Jersey City resident graduated from St. Peter's Preparatory School, St. Peter's College, and received his master's degree in social work from Fordham University after serving in World War II with the U.S. Navy. He studied for his doctorate degree at New York University.

Married to the former Marie Mosca, of west New York, they now reside in Lawrenceville, NJ, with their four children, Alfred B. Vuocolo, Jr., assistant counsel in the office of Governor Kean; Andrea, a professional artist; Robert, a CPA, and Lisa, a medical student.

The present Grand Master of the Knights of Malta is Most Eminent Highness Cardinal Angelo De Mojana di Cologna, a lawyer of Milan, who was elected for life in 1962. His Eminence John Cardinal O'Connor heads the Knights of Malta in the United States. Its members, in addition to the high honor, receive a coat of arms and pledge to continue their work striving for Christian perfection and to aid those in need.

Dr. Vuocola has lectured throughout the country and has served as president of the New Jersey Association of Social Workers.

During Dr. Vuocola's retirement dinner he was lauded by Governor Kean who said:

. . . Your 35 years of selfless dedication to improving the status of the less fortunate citizens of this State, particularly children, have exemplified the highest standards of public service.

Former New York Mayor Robert Wagner and Alexander Haig, former U.S. Secretary of State, are recipients of the award.

J. Peter Grace is president of the American Association of the Sovereign Military Order of Malta, and regional vice presidents are William H. Edwards, Intercontinental; Thomas P. Joyce, Midwestern; Bryan F. Smith, Southwestern; John A. Volpe, New England; Robert F. Wagner, mid-Atlantic; and David M. Walters, Southeastern.

At the solemn investiture ceremony His Eminence Bernard Cardinal Law was invested with about 100 individuals from throughout the country. For the first time, women have been vested according to His Eminence John Cardinal O'Connor.

Another New Jersey resident, Patricia Q. Sheehan, who has also given her life in the area of public service as mayor of New Brunswick, as a member of the cabinet, and as New Jersey Commissioner of Community Affairs, was also invested as a Dame of Malta at the same time.

In addition to Commissioner Perselay, those speaking at Dr. Vuocolo's retirement dinner on December 6, 1985, at Hamilton Square, NJ, included Robert Rusciano, assistant director, division of mental health and hospitals; Albert C. Wagner, chairman, board of trustees, forensic psychiatric hospital; Dennis Lafer, acting director, division of mental health and hospitals; Gary Hilton, assistant commissioner, department of corrections; Richard H. Wilson, deputy commissioner, department of human services; with benediction by Rev. W. Iving.

All those making presentations echo the words of Commissioner Perselay, praising Dr. Vuocolo's contribution, indicating that his serving of the mentally ill has been exceptional.

During his remarks, Alfred noted that the affair was conducted on his late father's birthday, and he would have been 90 years old. Reminiscing he told the audience, and especially his 60 nieces and nephews in attendance, of the trials and tribulations of his father, who came to America alone, at the age of 16, and raised a family of eight children and "was never on anyone's payroll."

Alfred took pride in telling the audience that his father encouraged his interest in social work indicating that "the poor and the unfortunate needed support." He indicated that the interest of his father, Vito, and his mother, Mary, for their neighbors instilled the need for the involvement of their offspring in the area of social work and community service.

There are almost 60 children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren in the Vuocolo family, with more than 75 percent being involved in the areas of child care, housing, criminal justice, mental health, nursing, law, and teaching and other public service careers.

Dr. Vuocolo's brother, Conrad, and his wife, Rosemarie, are long time family friends and members of my staff. Their brother, Salvatore, a former magistrate, was affiliated with my father, Frank J. Guarini, Sr., for many years, as an attorney at law. He was most supportive of my father, as was their late brothers, Joseph and Charles.

They introduced me to Dr. Vuocolo, who assisted me on many occasions during my career as a New Jersey State senator and as a Member of the House of Representatives in various programs in which I was involved regarding those in need, especially in the criminal justice system.

I recall how Dr. Vuocolo spoke with so much pride of his work building and directing the training school for boys at Skillman. He insisted on cottage living conditions for the boys ages 6 to 13 who already were involved in our criminal justice system and had to be provided for because of acts they committed which would have incarcerated them if they were adults.

Dr. Vuocolo assured that the training school for boys was the most modern facility, excellently staffed, and designed and operated with the principle in mind that the children needed special treatment and must be served.

During the building of the facility in Blawenburg, he insisted that classrooms, modern gymnasium facilities, libraries, comfortable living conditions were provided in order to try to save the children for reentry into community life.

One incident he told me about was when he met some opposition when his building plan called for a chapel on the State facility grounds, but he met the opposition and took pride that a religious influence of the choice of the young boys could be observed.

Alfred constantly stated that his care for the children had to provide hope for the future and his results are renowned, indeed a shining example for the entire Nation to follow.

Dr. Vuocolo gave of himself to his family, to his profession, to his God. Indeed he echoes the words of Elizabeth Bibesco who wrote in "Gifts": "Blessed are those who can give without remembering and take without forgetting."

Al Vuocolo, the best gifts you gave were:
To your enemy, forgiveness.
To an opponent, tolerance.
To a friend, your heart.
To a customer, service.
To all men, charity.
To every child, a good example.
To yourself, respect.

The fact that the Knights of Malta saw fit to invest Dr. Vuocolo pleases me deeply as I know that he made a great financial sacrifice in his lifetime to serve those he loved so much. He felt it was his way of paying back, and echoed the words of one of his favorite people, Bishop Fulton J. Sheen:

Some people have a belief that every tree, when it burns, gives back the colors that went into its making, they see in the flaming logs the red of many sunsets, the purple of early dawn, the silver of moonrise and the sparkle of stars. So it is with us: what we have accepted into our hearts and made a permanent part of ourselves is given back in times of trials.

I thank His Eminence John Cardinal O'Connor, Mr. Grace, and the Knights of Malta for making this proud family even prouder. I share the joy of his wife, Marie, and her mother, Jennie Mosca, their children, and his brothers and sisters, Anita, Irene, and Rosalie, who have walked with all members of their families, step by step serving God and man.

When hearing about Al's award I asked my good friend, Rev. Raymond Kupke, archivist of the Diocese of Paterson, to provide me with background on this illustrious group, and he told me of its prestigious quality and that its members made solemn promises to strive for Christian perfection, providing hospital and charitable works in more than 77 countries.

I am thankful for the special efforts and voluntarism which our Nation and world needs so badly, working for God and country.

Well done good and faithful servant.

RETIREMENT OF RICHARD K. GROULX

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, on January 30, the Central Labor Council of Alameda County, CA will celebrate the retirement of Richard K. Groulx. I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues the outstanding career of one of the Nation's preeminent local labor leaders.

Dick Groulx was born in 1924 in rural New York. During the Great Depression, his father moved the family to the Midwest, seeking work as a skilled mechanic. During that time his father was a UAW activist. His labor activities led to blacklisting, causing the family to move back to New York and then on to southern California.

Dick Groulx served in the Marine Corps during the Second World War, and was discharged as a corporal. He remained in Hawaii, and began his association with organized labor by volunteering with the Culinary Workers Union.

Upon his return to the mainland Dick worked as an organizer for Oakland Teamsters 588. In 1952, he transferred to Local 29 of the Professional Employees Union and began an aggressive campaign of organizing women in small companies. By enforcing union security provisions, the working conditions of these women were improved in an era of widespread sexism and sex discrimination.

In 1956, Dick ran for the position of assistant secretary to the Central Labor Council of Alameda County. With strong support from women and minority unionists, he achieved his goal, commencing his long career as a union leader.

His longstanding commitment to integration and full civil rights for all citizens found its expression in his vigorous efforts to effectuate the merger of the CIO and AFL members and unions in 1957. Over the next decade, he used his position to forge ahead for complete integration of crafts and peoples, 10 years before the National Government started implementing its own civil rights programs.

In 1958 the council, because of the integration efforts, secured strong minority support to defeat the right to work initiative, to develop a strong COPE, to send a crew to the Selma marches, to support the first Peace marches in Alameda County and to oppose the Gulf of Tonkin resolution.

When he was elected to the Central Labor Council's top position of executive secretary in 1967, Dick took his place as one of the most militant council leaders in the Nation. He helped lead the county's first successful public employee strike, expanded the COPE operation to elect pro-labor candidates and secured the council's support for the United Farm Workers, the first AFL-CIO council in the Nation to do so.

During the 40 years since he knocked on the Culinary Workers door, he has proven his dedication to working men and women everywhere. As a leader, he has had the vision to forge a cooperative relationship between his AFL-CIO council and the independent ILWU and Teamsters unions as well as to steer his own council on the most progressive course seen in the Nation. As a leader, he never believed in letting others carry the burden while he basked in the glory. His 17 arrests, most on picket lines, during his career attest to his willingness to sacrifice comfort and privilege to advance the cause of social and economic justice for all in our society.

I commend the career of Dick Groulx, and urge my colleagues to reflect on the unselfish and principled behavior that is being honored by his brothers and sisters in the union movement, and community leaders throughout the bay area, the State of California, and the Nation.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO DEA LANGLOIS—LAKEWOOD WOMEN'S DEMOCRATIC STUDY CLUB "WOMAN OF THE YEAR"

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am honored today to inform my colleagues that Dea Langlois has been selected as "Woman of the Year" by the Lakewood, CA, Women's Democratic Study Club.

A native of Wisconsin, Dea graduated from business college and moved to Washington, DC, where she worked for the Departments of Justice and Agriculture from 1941-45. In 1946 she began working for the U.S. Navy and met and married her husband, Marv.

In 1951, Dea and Marv bought their present home in Lakewood. Dea attended California State University at Long Beach and began her career in the field of education. She held positions at St. Maria Goretti Elementary, St. Bartholomew's Elementary, St. Anthony's K-12, DeMille Junior High School, and Hughes Junior High School. She retired in 1985 after 26 years of service.

In addition to her professional duties, Dea has somehow managed to find the time to devote countless hours to her community and the Democratic Party. She has been actively involved with the Los Angeles County Democratic Central Committee, Democratic State Central Committee, California Democratic Council, numerous local, State, and national elections and many hearings and meetings relating to the Democratic Party. Additionally, she has been involved with the Long Beach Math Association, California Math Council, National Council of the Teachers of Mathematics, Teachers Association of Long Beach, California Teachers Association, and the National Education Association.

Mr. Speaker, Dea Langlois has done much over the years in helping make the Lakewood area such a special place to live and work. And her commitment to the Democratic Party has not gone unnoticed by her colleagues across the State of California. My wife, Lee, joins me in congratulating Dea on this special occasion and we wish her and her husband, Marv, and their daughter, Cheri, continued success and happiness in all their future endeavors.

MARYLAND DEPOSITORS FAIRNESS ACT OF 1986

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Maryland Depositors Fairness Act of 1986.

This legislation amends the IRS Code of 1954 to "defer the inclusion in gross income of interest on certain deposits which are subject to withdrawal restrictions by reason of the bankruptcy or insolvency of the financial institution" until depositors have access to such income.

Mr. Speaker, a number of my constituents who have deposits in Maryland savings and loans have asked me to help make sure they are treated fairly by the IRS. These depositors have already suffered economic hardships because of the S&L crisis in Maryland. For them to have to pay Federal taxes on income to which they do not have access would only compound the injustice of this unfortunate situation.

The Maryland Depositors Fairness Act would simply defer payment of taxes by depositors on their interest income until the time when they are able to freely use this income.

A LATE CHRISTMAS PRESENT TO THE PLO

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, on December 31, the head of the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua sent a late Christmas present to Yasir Arafat of the PLO: A letter condemning Israel and praising the PLO for their heroic struggle. Mr. Ortega also expressed his gratitude for the PLO's solidarity with Nicaragua. The purpose of the letter was ostensibly to congratulate the PLO on its 20th anniversary.

I wonder what the valuable solidarity of the PLO is for which the Nicaraguan people are supposed to be grateful. Perhaps Arafat has a return gift for Mr. Ortega in the form of tips about how to export terrorism.

This letter speaks for itself, and I am including it in the RECORD for the enlightenment of my colleagues:

NICARAGUA'S ORTEGA SENDS LETTER TO ARAFAT

[Managua Prensa Latina in Spanish to Prensa Latina Havana, Dec. 31, 1985]

[Letter sent by Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega to Yasir Arafat, president of the Central Committee of the PLO; date not given]

Commander YASIR ARAFAT,
President,
Central Executive Committee, PLO.

DEAR COMMANDER: On the occasion of the 20th anniversary of the Armed Forces of the Palestinian national liberation struggle, I send you on behalf of the National Directorate of the FSLN and the people and Government of Nicaragua, as well as myself, our fraternal and solidarity embrace. On this historical date we would like to renew our firm solidarity and support for the Palestinian people's just struggle in favor of their inalienable rights over their occupied territories. Likewise, we want to reiterate our strong condemnation and rejection of the policy of force and intimidation exerted by Israel, in an effort to deny the heroic Palestinian people their unrenounceable right to self-determination, flagrantly violating the UN Charter and the Security Council resolutions.

Taking advantage of this memorable occasion to express gratitude for the Palestinian people's valuable solidarity and that of their legitimate representative, the PLO, I want to express our firm conviction that our peoples' just cause will prevail over the policy of force imposed on us today because of our unyielding decision to defend our legitimate rights. Receive, with our recognition of your people's heroic struggle, the fraternal greetings of Sandino's people.

Fraternally,

DANIEL ORTEGA SAAVEDRA.

RECOGNIZING JAMES VAN ZANDT

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Wednesday, January 22, 1986

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my Pennsylvania colleagues in recognizing the Honorable James Van Zandt, who died of cancer on January 6. "Jimmy" Van Zandt served 11 terms in the House of Representatives and then as special Washington representative of the Governor of Pennsylvania until 1971. For 20 years, he served as secretary of the Pennsylvania congressional delegation, where he continued to make devoted friends and contribute to the Congress and Pennsylvania.

Jimmy Van Zandt knew a lot about the defense needs of this country, starting his military career in 1917 as an apprentice seaman in the U.S. Navy and retiring as a rear admiral in 1959 in the U.S. Naval Reserve. He saw active duty in both World Wars and the Korean war. In the House, he served on the House Armed Services Committee and was the ranking minority member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. He served his country as a civic leader as well, holding the position of national commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars three times.

We all admired his energy after his retirement and marveled at his physical strength. The House of Representatives kept him young in spirit and in body—and Jimmy made the House of Representatives a better place by contributing his spirit and energy to the community represented by the House of Representatives. We will all miss him and we all want to extend our sympathy to his family and express our appreciation for his life.

THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF CUB SCOUT PACK 461

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church of Philadelphia for their sponsorship and support of Cub Scout Pack 461. The Scout troop will celebrate its 25th anniversary on February 2, 1986.

The Cub Scout Program provides youngsters with an avenue for community involvement, creativity, and service. Thousands of boys each year begin to become active citizens by recognizing their civic responsibility for duty and service in Cub Scout troops across America. Beyond that, the Cub Scout Program provides boys with a chance to meet other boys, plan cultural and historical outings, and participate in sport and camping activities.

Without sponsors, Scouting organizations could not exist. For this reason, I ask my colleagues to join me as I recognize the outstanding contribution the Evangelical Lutheran Church has made to the Northeast Philadelphia community. For 25 years the church has offered assistance and guidance to the troop over and above providing their hall for meetings and activities. Its constant encouragement is undoubtedly a source of the troop leaders' success as educators, and the pack's achievements throughout 25 years of community involvement. By lending a hand to Cub Scout Pack 461, the Trinity Evangelical Lutheran Church has enriched the larger community and provided a foundation and example for the future.

NATIONAL JAYCEE WEEK

HON. BERKLEY BEDELL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, as this is National Jaycee Week, I would like to recognize the accomplishments of the Jaycees in my home State of Iowa.

Over the past year they succeeded in raising nearly $60,000 for the Muscular Dystrophy Association. They also raised money for the Kids With a Dream Program, which helps terminally ill children realize a dream. This program was founded by David Stiener, of Des Moines. He was later honored as one of the "Ten Outstanding Young Americans" for this original concept.

The Iowa Jaycees also recognize an outstanding young farmer during the month of February. This program, which originated in Shenandoah, IA, during 1951, has now become a national program for the Jaycees.

Physical fitness is another high priority of the Jaycees. Each year they sponsor a junior athletic program in which youngsters participate in an Olympic competition. The Iowa Jaycees are also credited with starting the Run, Punt, and Pass Program in the Midwest.

Besides the development of the body, the Jaycees also encourage the advancement of the mind. During the month of May the Jaycees sponsor the Young Iowans' Leadership Program. The Jaycees also sponsor substance abuse awareness programs throughout the State of Iowa.

I am very proud of the accomplishments of the Iowa Jaycees and I wish them the best of luck in the year ahead.

PRESIDENT MUST CONSULT WITH CONGRESS BEFORE ACTING ON NATIONAL EMERGENCY

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation requiring the President to submit a more detailed report to the Congress on the national emergency with respect to Nicaragua, and request that following a thorough review of this report both Houses of Congress meet to consider a vote on whether the emergency declared in Nicaragua should be terminated.

During the past 9 months, the President has declared national emergencies in three areas, Nicaragua, South Africa, and most recently in Libya. In each case the President also imposed emergency economic sanctions, such as the trade embargo with Nicaragua.

The President acted in all three instances under the authority of the National Emergencies Act [NEA], enacted in 1976 and amended in 1985, and the International Emergency Economic Powers Act [IEEPA], enacted in 1977. These statutes were enacted in the aftermath of Watergate and sought to subject the President's use of emergency powers to strict procedural limitations. Specifically, the President is required to do two things. The President is required to consult with Congress before acting under the NEA and the IEEPA and consult regularly once the actions have been carried out. Second, the President is required to transmit reports to Congress at the time of the initial action and every 6 months thereafter.

In addition to the Presidential requirements, the Congress has the option to consider a joint resolution on whether to continue the current emergency actions.

The essence of my legislation is twofold. First of all, I would require a more detailed report from the President outlining specific areas I believe should be reported. I believe this more specific information is essential in order for Congress to understand the total picture and decide on whether a vote on this issue is warranted. Contained within my legislation is a timetable for this action.

I have introduced this bill because I do not believe the President or the Congress have fulfilled their duties concerning the original intent of the NEA and the IEEPA. I believe our President should be held accountable and the Congress must respond to this explanation.

UNITED COMMUNITY CHURCH OF GLENDALE, CA, CELEBRATES 25TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to recognize the United Community Church of Glendale, which on January 26, 1986, will celebrate its 25th anniversary.

The United Community Church is one of the youngest churches in Glendale, yet it has one of the most impressive records in terms of growth. Founded in 1961 in the foothill community of La Crescenta, the basic idea behind the formation of the church was "biblical truth and patriotism."

This mixture struck a responsive chord with many people in the community, and the church grew rapidly. Soon it moved to downtown Glendale where it temporarily occupied the Tuesday Afternoon Club.

Today, it occupies a sanctuary and support buildings in Glendale that are beautiful and permanent. The centerpiece of the church complex is a splendid and unique amphitheater. Other structures of architectural note are the Heritage Hall, the library, and the Rose Chapel.

Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the United Community Church, its founding pastor, Dr. W.S. McBirnie, and each member of the congregation on their 25th anniversary.

REHABILITATION ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986

HON. PAT WILLIAMS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Rehabilitation Act Amendments of 1986, a bill which reauthorizes this Nation's rehabilitation efforts, extending them for 5 years, and making a number of modest changes in the language of this statute.

The Rehabilitation Act is very important, Mr. Speaker. It provides the mechanism by which the States and the Federal Government have maintained a successful partnership for a number of years. This partnership has worked to the benefit of our economy by providing employment-related assistance to individuals who are disabled, thereby increasing the contributions by such individuals to our economy. It also helps some persons with disabilities maintain a level of independence that adds immeasurably to the quality of their lives, and thus, enriches us all.

The Subcommittee on Select Education has held five hearings around the country and in Washington. We have heard from many witnesses, representing individuals, governments, and rehabilitation organizations. Out of these many helpful discussions have come the suggestions that are now incorporated in this proposed reauthorization bill.

I referred to the changes as "modest." Witnesses pointed out a variety of problem issues that minor statutory changes could resolve. For example, this bill modifies the definition of local agency in order to ensure that Indian organizations are included in this definition. Other examples of such modest changes would include adding a requirement that the annual report go to the Congress simultaneously with its delivery to the President and making the language gender-free.

Several management changes are also proposed in this legislation. Currently, the Office of Special Education and Rehabilitation Services consists of three units, the Office of Special Education, the Rehabilitation Service Administration, and the National Institute for Handicapped Research. The heads of these units report to the Assistant Secretary. The head of special education is appointed by the Secretary; the remaining two are appointed by the President. In this legislation all three would become secretarial level appointees to a Presidentially appointed Assistant Secretary. The changes would become effective upon a vacancy in the current slots.

Examples of other management changes include increasing the public membership of the Architectural and Transportation Barriers Board, to balance an increase in the Federal agency members that occurred when HEW became HHS and DOE, and specifying that the chairman of that board is elected from the public members.

This legislation would require that the Director of the National Institute of Handicapped Research, working with the Interagency Committee, come up with recommendations for establishment of some type of agency or mechanism for ensuring the development of cost-effective production and marketing of technological devices and the efficient distribution of such to persons with disabilities.

However, there is one change that is not modest and I would be remiss in not pointing it out to my colleagues. Presently, and for some time, the Rehabilitation Act contains an 80-20 match requirement. The Federal share is 80 percent. Repeatedly, we have heard from State directors of rehabilitation agencies and from others that the system is not serving anywhere close to the true number of individuals who might be eligible for such services. It is equally clear that investment in rehabilitation is a sound investment; the returns outweigh the costs. Therefore, it is time that the States begin to take a greater role in this partnership that is so beneficial to all our citizens. I am proposing in this legislation to change the match to 75-25, and at the same time, ensure that the States' contributions do not drop below their fiscal year 1985 levels.

Finally, the bill also includes language to reauthorize the Helen Keller National Center Act for 3 years and would authorize funding for that center at current levels.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the proposed changes reflect sound policy. The Subcommittee on Select Education will soon hold hearings on this bill, and we welcome the input of everyone concerned about rehabilitation as we move to finalize this legislation in the coming months.

LEGISLATION THAT PROHIBITS THE PURCHASE OF SOVIET ENRICHMENT SERVICES FOR UNITED STATES NUCLEAR POWERPLANTS

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 23, 1986

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill which prohibits nuclear electric power utilities in the United States from purchasing uranium enrichment services from the Soviet Union.

The United States operates a uranium enrichment program through the Department of Energy, and it is intended to be fully self-sufficient through the revenues it generates from the customers it serves. In the recent past, the demand for uranium enrichment services has been substantially reduced causing a significant retrenchment in the Government's program and the closure of one of the Government's three uranium enrichment plants in the United States.

Soviet Union sales of enrichment services to domestic utilities impair the ability of the United States to continue its uranium enrichment program, which the United States operates without a profit for the benefit of electric ratepayers.

The Soviet Union does not operate its uranium enrichment business on the principles of a free market society. They offer this enrichment services at a discount from whatever level is established as the price of enrichment services in the United States.

The Soviet Union is an unfair competitor and enrichment service sales to U.S. citizens detract from the national energy security of the United States.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, January 27, 1986

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. FOLEY].

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, DC,
January 24, 1986.

I hereby designate the Honorable THOMAS S. FOLEY to act as Speaker pro tempore on Monday, January 27, 1986.

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

We are aware, O God, of the sacrifices that the people of the armed services have experienced and we acknowledge their bravery and devotion. We remember those lost and particularly their families that they will know the comfort of Your presence and the assurance of Your eternal love. Help us all to know that in death or life You watch over us and that underneath all our lives are Your everlasting arms. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

HOUSE-PASSED SUPERFUND REAUTHORIZATION BILL SHOULD BE SUSTAINED BY CONFEREES

(Mr. FAZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, a General Accounting Office report was released which revealed that a number of Federal agencies, including McClellan Air Force Base in my district, have been dumping toxic wastes at the Kettleman Hills disposal facility in southern California.

This is the same hazardous waste dump, Mr. Speaker, that the Environmental Protection Agency has repeatedly cited for violating the Federal laws which govern the safe disposal of toxics.

Because of the significant violations against Kettleman Hills, EPA barred the facility from receiving any Superfund wastes. EPA took the right action. The Agency wants to ensure that Superfund wastes do not go to facilities like Kettleman Hills which may themselves become future Superfund sites.

Despite EPA's action against Kettleman Hills, Federal agencies have continued to dump huge quantities of poisons at the facility. The Secretary of Defense and other Federal agency heads must stop this practice immediately. Failure to do so creates a potential future legal liability for the Federal Government and threat to the public health.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, this incident points out the need for the Congress to put EPA in charge of the cleanup of all Superfund sites, including the cleanup of military Superfund sites like McClellan, currently exempt by Executive order. The House-passed Superfund reauthorization bill accomplishes this and should be sustained by the conferees.

EXTENSION OF WAIVER AUTHORITY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA REVENUE BOND ACT OF 1985

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the District of Columbia be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H.R. 4027) extending the waiver authority of the District of Columbia Revenue Bond Act of 1985 to certain revenue bond acts of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from the District of Columbia?

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MCKINNEY] at this time.

Mr. MCKINNEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, will the chairman of the subcommittee please explain the bill to the House.

Mr. PARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from the District of Columbia for his response.

Mr. FAUNTROY. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to correct a clerical error which occurred after Congress adjourned sine die on December 19, 1985. On that last day of the session both the House and Senate adopted identical language as H.R. 3718, entitled the District of Columbia Revenue Bond Act of 1985.

Unfortunately, the final page of the bill—as amended and voted on by both the House and Senate—did not get copied onto the parchment sheets that are the final enrolled bill prepared for signatures of the Speaker of the House, the President of the Senate, and the President of the United States.

Of course that part of the bill as signed by the President on the day after Christmas, December 26, 1985, is now law. It is Public Law 99-216. All we are doing today is adding the missing page already voted on by the House and Senate on December 19, 1985, so that it too will become law.

The President signed so much of the congressional enactment as included revenue bonds of Georgetown University and Sibley Memorial Hospital. Today we are adding bonds for American University and George Washington University, already approved by Congress on December 19, 1985, but missing through clerical error from the bill as signed by the President.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, my purpose in reserving my right to object was that this matter is being brought forward under unanimous consent, which is an unusual procedure. This is District Day; we could bring this bill forward under the normal District procedures, presumably, but we have not. The bill was not referred to committee. I do understand that it is a technical oversight. It is something about the last page or the last two paragraphs or whatever. It does not seem to be a matter of great urgency.

I just wonder if the gentleman can enlighten us as to this. I certainly have not been informed. Frankly, I did not know the bill was on the calendar for this morning until this morning. I am not aware of any particular emergency that would require the abandonment of the normal District of Columbia legislative procedures.

Could the gentleman give us a further explanation?

I yield to the gentleman from the District of Columbia for his response.

Mr. FAUNTROY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I suspect that it is rare that the House and Senate pass legislation, and that due to an inadvertent error, a page of legislation is not included in the document signed by the President.

It was purely an error, and we thought in light of the heavy schedule which the Congress has in this second session, that the unanimous consent motion like this would have no problem passing.

Mr. PARRIS. I understand that there was an error committed in the legislative process. My point, though, if I might say to my friend from the District, we have another District Day 2 weeks from today. This matter could be referred to the normal committee; some perfunctory hearing could be held on the bill.

I am, very frankly, constrained to object as a result of the procedure and the precedent that we may in fact be establishing here. I concern myself with some of the business processes of the committee on which I am privileged to serve. I would certainly hate to see us establish a precedent in which we are, in some way, short-circuiting those processes.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. McKINNEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I will assure the gentleman from Virginia that I am in the same boat that he is. I was not, unfortunately, due to my health, able to participate in the last mad, halcyon days of the session, but I did watch on channel 56, courtesy of the Virginia University system. I was appalled that anything got done correctly, let alone this.

So I am willing to go along with the chairman of the subcommittee on what, obviously, was a clerical mistake at this point. It was obviously understandable considering the confusion. I do not approve of the system at all. I would say to the gentleman that if you are being skewered, which American University and several others, Georgetown, are, then you feel the immediacy and the urgency of the situation far more than you do standing up here on the Hill, way past your college years.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, do I understand from the gentleman that you would certainly not consider this a precedent of normal business procedures in the committee, and that there is some urgency in the 2 weeks between today and the next District of Columbia Day; that these bonds will be in some way affected?

I yield to the gentleman from the District of Columbia for his response.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Yes, I think there is. May I state first that I do think there is some urgency. Both George Washington and American Universities are very important institutions of higher education in our Nation's Capital.

They have at risk here $62 million in revenue needed for vital programs, and to delay them even 2 weeks, I think, would be unnecessary in light of the fact again that we had thorough hearings, took testimony at length, and reached a considered judgment both in subcommittee and in the full committee.

The House considered it, the Senate did as well, and passed identical bills.

Again the only reason we have had to do this is due to a clerical error on the part of the Clerk perhaps during the last day of the holiday season, and that is what created this situation for us.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, certainly we all regret that there has to be error in all of our lives. I am the ranking Republican on the subcommittee that deals with this matter and that dealt with the matter originally, and if it was a matter of such timely urgency, I would have thought that the institutions that were involved would have in some way sought to contact us before this matter came on the floor today.

However, based on the representations of my friend, the gentleman from the District of Columbia, and the observations of the gentleman from Connecticut, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TORRES). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from the District of Columbia?

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I can assure the gentleman from Virginia that this will not be our considered operation. I disapprove of it, also. I also disapproved of the fact of the gentleman from Virginia not being on the bill, although the other gentleman from Virginia is, since he is the ranking member of the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from the District of Columbia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 4027

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. GRANTING OF WAIVER.

Section 2(c) of the District of Columbia Revenue Bond Act of 1985 (Public Law 99-216) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(3) The American University Revenue Bond Act of 1985 (Series A), District of Columbia Act 6-111, transmitted to the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate December 4, 1985.

"(4) The George Washington University Revenue Bond Act of 1985 (Series A), District of Columbia Act 6-114, transmitted to the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate December 18, 1985".

SEC. 2. EFFECTIVE DATE OF ACTS; TREATMENT OF OBLIGATIONS.

(a) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The District of Columbia Acts referred to in the amendment made by section 1 shall take effect as if included in section 2(c) of the District of Columbia Revenue Bond Act of 1985 on the date of the enactment of such Act.

(b) TREATMENT OF OBLIGATIONS.—(1) Subject to paragraph (2), for purposes of any Act of Congress (and any amendments made by any Act of Congress) enacted after December 31, 1985, any obligation issued under the authority of the District of Columbia Acts made effective under subsection (a) shall be deemed to have been issued on December 31, 1985.

(2) Paragraph (1) shall apply only to obligations issued not more than sixty days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AN ALLEGED BOONDOGGLE IN OREGON

(Mr. WEAVER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, last fall the House, under my motion to deauthorize the Elk Creek Dam in Oregon, narrowly missed defeating that dam by a vote of 220 to 200. It is a dam with no purpose. It is a loss of $120 million, added to the deficit, to build a dam in a spot which I was able to jump over at the small stream—Elk Creek Stream—at the place of the damsite.

This is a boondoggle. It should not be built just because it has been planned for many years. It is going ahead mindlessly under construction.

Last week the Corps of Engineers, which opposes the building of the dam, nevertheless, operating under congressional instructions, awarded the bid of $62,700,000 for the construction of the dam to a Japanese corporation. So we have the instance of a boondoggle dam, wasting deficit money, being built by a foreign corporation.

I wonder what is happening to our country when we waste money on projects and have foreign corporations build them.

How many dams or other projects are American companies building in Japan? How much longer can we in Oregon and elsewhere in the country go on with Canadian dumping of our lumber on our lumber markets, driving our mills out of business, and tens of thousands of our workers out of their jobs?

THE BREAKUP OF THE AMERICAN FAMILY

(Mr. COATS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks, and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, for the last few years I have been calling attention to the fact that many of the social problems that our Nation faces can be traced to the breakup of the American family. As ranking member of the House Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, I have witnessed at first hand the link between family disorientation and teen pregnancy, drug and alcohol abuse, runaway youth, juvenile delinquency, sexual abuse and exploitation, and other social ills affecting our society.

I am becoming increasingly pleased that this message is now being acknowledged by many of our opinion leaders. I would like to commend CBS for its insightful and powerful documentary titled "The Vanishing Family—Crisis in Black America" which aired this past Saturday evening.

Mr. Speaker, I also submit for the record two recent commentaries which appeared in the Washington Post, authored by David Broder and William Raspberry. The impact of the breakup of the American family is so devastating and the need for restoration so great that all segments of our society must address this issue of how we can best strengthen the American family.

Mr. Speaker, the editorials to which I referred are as follows:

Drumbeat for the Family

(By David S. Broder)

Over the past 25 years, it is hard to think of two public figures who have more consistently and constructively addressed the major concerns of this nation than Daniel Patrick Moynihan and Bill Moyers. That both of them now have chosen to focus on the breakdown of the family, especially the black family, strongly suggests that the rest of us should pay attention.

Moyers' documentary on CBS Saturday night brought to life the painful reality of which Moynihan, the senator from New York, wrote in his newly published book, "Family and Nation." That reality is that a growing portion of America's young people—a large majority of blacks and more than one-third of whites—will spend a substantial portion of their first 18 years in a "family" with no man as its head.

Many of them will have started life as children born out of wedlock, often as children of females still in their teens. They are part of a "culture of poverty" that mocks the economic gains the rest of us are enjoying.

Alice Sondra Jackson, one of Moyers' subjects, was 20 when her first child was born. She had graduated from high school, taken a year at a business school and was working steadily when she got pregnant. "I wanted to be a mother, you know," she said. "It was exciting to me. I just thought I'd have something of my own, a little child that's gonna call me Mama. . . ." Two more pregnancies followed in the next three years. Alice now lives on welfare, though she says, "It makes you lazy just to sit around and wait for a monthly check to come in."

The father of her children is Timothy McSeed, who has three other living children by as many other women—none of whom he supports. Born to a 16-year-old unmarried woman, Timothy is a high-school dropout who has not worked in almost three years. He will marry, he says, when he can afford "a big wedding" with all the trimmings.

Stories like this are what made Eleanor Holmes Norton, a black scholar, lawyer and public official, say, "Repair of the black family is central to any serious strategy to improve the black condition."

But not just the black family. As Moynihan writes, "By the mid-1980s, it was clear that family disorganization had become a general feature of the American population and not just an aspect of a frequently stigmatized and appropriately sensitive minority community."

In 1965, Moynihan described an "approaching new crisis in race relations" because one-fifth of the nonwhite families had a female head of household. Today, he notes, "single-parent families with children accounted for more than one-quarter of all family groups—white, black, Hispanic, et al. . . . What was a crisis condition for the one group in 1960 is now the general condition."

What lies ahead for the growing number of one-parent children is indicated by a 1980 Kettering Foundation study cited by Moynihan. They are poor students; 40 percent are rated low-achievers. They are sick more often, absent more often, more likely to be truant and twice as likely to drop out short of graduation. At which point, they are far more likely to be unemployed—and perhaps unemployable. And procreating another generation like themselves.

So what is to be done? Everyone acknowledges that to the extent the problem is most severe in the black community, as it is, it challenges the total leadership of that community—its stable families, its churches and it growing middle class.

But the larger society cannot turn its back on the problem, for it is our problem too. Moynihan, perhaps overoptimistically, suggests that both conservatives and liberals may be able to see the need for something he has long championed, a "family policy." Such a policy would consciously shape every area of government—taxes, Social Security, welfare, housing, anti-crime and anti-drug measures—to strengthen incentives and supports for two-parent families.

It remains to be seen whether that concern will inform decision-making in this age of budget-cutting. But even if an immediate response is unlikely, the challenge must be posed, as Moyers and Moynihan have posed it. Carolyn Wallace, who with her husband runs a community center in the heart of the Newark ghetto, closed Moyers' program by assuring him that preaching greater personal and social responsbility was not in vain.

"They won't listen to me," Moyers said.

"It doesn't make any difference," she replied. "You've got to say it anyway. They may not listen to me, either. But . . . if you say it in your corner and I say it in my corner, and everybody's saying it, it's going to be like a drumbeat, and sooner or later it will sound. . . . I think it's going to surpass color. And you're not going to be safe. I'm not going to be safe, and nobody's going to be safe unless we all send out this drumbeat—hey, let's deal with it. Let's deal with the problem."

The Vanishing Black Family

(By William Raspberry)

Teachers and principals searching for effective material for their sex education classes might want to tape Saturday night's Bill Moyers special. "The Vanishing Family—Crisis in Black America."

The two-hour CBS production contains lessons for just about everybody. It is a reminder to the social theoreticians that we really do need to look at the way we do welfare; it is an alarm bell telling church and community leaders that they had better get busy rebuilding the collapsed value system in the black ghettos, and it makes clear the inability of government, no matter how generous or compassionate, to deal with the problem.

But its greatest value may be as an instrument of sex education for the young people who are playing at sex, with hardly any recognition of what a dangerous game they play—for them and for America.

And especially for black America.

"Single parent families," Moyers reminds us, "are twice as common in America today as they were 20 years ago. But for the majority of white children, 'family' still means a father and a mother. This is not true for most black children, For them, things are getting worse. Today, black teen-agers have the highest pregnancy rate in the industrial world, and in the black inner city, practically no teen-age mother gets married."

Yes, there are strong, successful black families; the "Huxtables" of the Bill Cosby Show represent a reality that gets too little play on television. But the Moyers special is about a different reality: the almost irretrievable collapse of the family in the black ghettos.

The alarming increase in the number of teen-age mothers is both the result and the accelerator of that collapse.

But as "The Vanishing Family" makes clear, the inner-city teen-agers themselves seem wildly oblivious of the crisis. Few of the young mothers interviewed planned to have babies, but hardly any of them took any precautions against it, not because they are ignorant of birth control but because they are ignorant of the implications of having babies before they are ready—psychologically, educationally or economically—to be parents. The young fathers display an unsettling combination of pride in having fathered babies and utter indifference to the babies themselves.

"Well," offers a young man who has sired six babies by four different women, and who supports none of them, "This is something that I've done. Just like the carpenter, here's something that you've done. You can see what you've done if it's anything. If you don't do nothing, you can see something, you know, what your life was, you know, it was to you."

And how does he expect his children to survive without any support from him?

"Well, the majority of the mothers are on welfare, and welfare gives them the stipend for the months, so what I'm not doing, the government does."

That's part of the breakdown. The other, in many ways deadlier, part is that the young women expect—even unconsciously encourage—just such an attitude.

Moyers asks one mother whether she wants her own children to get married.

"Sure," she says. "Especially my daughter. My boys, they'll probably be—whatcha call it?—free-lancers."

If it seems as though no one has given these young people any conception of what being a real father entails, it is because no one has. Often themselves products of teenage pregnancies, many of them have never experienced the presence of a normal, functioning father. The idea of a husband as a provider, disciplinarian and role model for his sons seems not to occur to them.

A part of the reason may lie in the stupendously high unemployment rate that renders inner-city young men superfluous except as intermittent lovers. Part of it may be the changed moral climate that renders out-of-wedlock parenting free of moral censure, and part of it may be welfare's usurpation of the father's breadwinning role.

But as "The Vanishing Family" makes alarmingly clear, welfare can provide money but it cannot teach boys how to be men. It's something the rest of us will have to do, starting right now. Indeed, for much of the growing underclass, it may already be too late.

SENATE—Monday, January 27, 1986

The Senate met at 12 noon and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Eternal Father, "God of all comfort, Who comforts us in all our affliction," on this 13th anniversary of the Paris accords, which ended American involvement in Vietnam, we join with multitudes in remembering those still missing in action, or prisoners of war. It is painful to contemplate the unimaginable suffering, the indescribable pain, and unspeakable boredom endured by those who have been languishing so many years. Minutes become hours, hours—days, days—weeks, weeks—months, and months stretched into years without relief. Nor can we, who have not experienced such loss, identify with their loved ones for whom anxiety and hope were mixed, and finally became hopelessness and despair. God of all comfort, we pray for those who remain in Vietnam. Your love and grace in the confidence that You, the Omnipresent One, are there. We pray for their loved ones the peace and comfort that only the God of all comfort can give. And we pray for those public servants and private citizens who do not forget, and are doing all in their power to resolve this unconscionable situation. We pray in His name Who suffers when those He loves suffers. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each followed by a special order for the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] for not to exceed 15 minutes.

That will be followed by routine morning business not to exceed 1 hour with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 10 minutes each.

Following routine morning business, the Senate will resume consideration of S. 638, Conrail. Pending is the committee substitute.

I understand that there may be two or three amendments. Hopefully some can be worked out, and accepted by both sides.

I do not know of any rollcall votes that will occur. There will be no rollcall votes after 6 p.m. in any event.

For the information of all Senators, the State of the Union Message will occur tomorrow, Tuesday, January 28. Members are asked to be in the Chamber no later than 8:30 p.m. so that we can go as a group to the House of Representatives Chamber.

NOTICE CONCERNING 1985 YEAR END REPORT REQUIRED BY THE FEDERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN ACT, AS AMENDED

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wish to advise that the mailing and filing date for the 1985 Year End Report required by the Federal Election Campaign Act, as amended is Friday, January 31, 1986. Principal Campaign Committees supporting Senate candidates file their reports with the Senate Office of Public Records, 232 Hart Building, Washington, DC 20510.

The Senate Office of Public Records will be open from 9 a.m. until 12 midnight on the filing date for the purpose of accepting these filings. The extended evening hours, after 5:30 p.m., are being instituted on a trial basis to ascertain the level of interest in extended filing hours.

In general, reports will be available 24 hours after receipt. For further information, please do not hesitate to contact the Public Records Office on (202) 224-0322.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished President pro tempore who presides over the Senate at this moment.

A POET AND SCHOLAR AMONG US

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, most of our distinguished colleagues are multidimensional men and women. They possess talents and interests that reach beyond the skills for which they have most often earned respect here in the Senate. For example, two of our colleagues, Senator HART of Colorado and Senator COHEN of Maine, recently wrote and published a novel together that has done well in the bookstores, I am told. Before entering electoral politics Senator MOYNIHAN of New York was a university professor, and is esteemed in policy and academic circles for the authoritative essays and studies on a variety of questions that he periodically publishes. Those are but a few examples of Senate talent that I could cite.

But today, as a lover of poetry, myself—and I do not write poetry, but I do like poetry—I want to call the Senate's attention to the poetic talents of one of our other colleagues.

Senator SPARK MATSUNAGA of Hawaii was first elected to the Senate in 1976, and became a member of this body after 14 years of service in the House of Representatives. Educated at the University of Hawaii and Harvard University Law School, Senator MATSUNAGA rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel in World War II as a member of the famed Nisei 100th Infantry Battalion. Much decorated, Senator MATSUNAGA was twice wounded and counts among his military awards the Purple Heart with Oak Leaf Cluster.

In addition to his exemplary work in the Senate, Senator MATSUNAGA has taken the time and the pains required to compose many verses of admirable poetry. Recently, some of Senator MATSUNAGA's poems were included in a complimentary 1986 pocket calendar that Senator MATSUNAGA had printed and sent to me. He may have sent the same to others.

I also call our colleagues' attention to an exceptional piece of research and analysis that Senator MATSUNAGA coauthored a few years ago on the operations and nature of the House of Representatives' Rules Committee. I remember that he gave me a copy of this book shortly after he came to the Senate—or, it may have been immediately before he came to the Senate, and during his campaign for election to the Senate.

That work, entitled "Rulemakers of the House," should be interesting reading for those of us who were Members of the House of Representatives prior to our election to the Senate. I am also confident that students of American government, and the Congress in particular, will find Senator MATSUNAGA's study a rich resource for many years.

Senator MATSUNAGA is to be congratulated for the contributions that he had made in his book on the House Rules Committee, for his fine poetry, and for his continuing work among us here in the Senate.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the lines and verses of Senator MATSUNAGA's poetry to which

I earlier alluded be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Success in life demands an early goal,
Which you yourself must set and strive to gain.
'Tis better to be known as a good man than a great one,
For greatness is an assessment of mortals;
Goodness a gift of God.

Envy him not who sings and trips along,
For saddened hearts oft hide behind a song.
Remember happier days you've known and sing,
And Life's detractors lose their painful sting.

A soul completely immersed in one's work
Reflects a youthful face.

Commence your work wherever you can;
Your major task may be to start.

In fending Life's soul-trying blows,
Let Patience be your winning ploy.

To seek out the wrong is only half the task;
To set it right is the tougher half.

Strike at your foe and be struck in return;
Befriend your foe and secure your own peace.

Learn well the languages and the arts:
A genius unable to express himself is no better than a silent fool.

As small as it may seem,
A good deed is always worth the doing.

The manner in which you perform your daily tasks
Builds and reveals your personal character.

Personal suffering begets deeper understanding of human values.

DEJA VU

(By Spark Matsunaga)

I've been here before, I say—
That house, that wall, that brook
I've seen them all before;
Yet I've neither been this way
Nor read in any book
Of what I see, I'm sure.
What strange things
Our minds must know;
We know not yet our minds.

ON RELIGION

(By Spark Matsunaga)

When I think of the foolish fight
That men o'er religious differences wage,
I can see mortals in blind plight,
Headed towards one goal, whatever their rage.
As waters run from different heights and ferret rivers to a common sea,
So do men make different rites and found religions to one great Deity.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may reserve my time throughout the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NICKLES). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized.

WHY ARE SO MANY AFRAID TO TALK ABOUT THE GORBACHEV ARMS CONTROL PROPOSAL?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, hurray for Scotty Reston of the New York Times, and Mary McGrory of the Washington Post. These two veteran columnists are among the few who have fractured the thundering silence that has greeted the most momentous, far reaching, and very possibly hypocritical arms control proposal since the dawn of the nuclear age: The Gorbachev proposal for eliminating nuclear arms within 14 years, and drastically reducing conventional arms.

McGrory denounced the lack of a full scale reaction in this country as "The Insult of Silence." Reston searched out the most constructive and realistic parts of the massive Gorbachev package, and ignored the rest. In all fairness, President Reagan did say that the Gorbachev proposal offered new and constructive possibilities. Sure that was a reaction. But it was a vague, generalized response.

What kind of reaction did this Gorbachev bombshell get from the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency? How about the State Department? The Defense Department? The Senate Foreign Relations Committee? The House Foreign Relations Committee? Answer: Nothing. As McGrory wrote: The answer in all cases was the insult of silence. And yet the silence of much of official Washington was understandable. With an arms control package this complex, responsible officials could plead caution while they think it over.

But how about the American press? Certainly this astonishing change in arms control policy by the other superpower—our prime nuclear adversary in the world—should be expected to provoke a raging flood of discussion and debate from the great American press. How many widely circulated columnists are there in this country today: conservative, liberal, middle of the road? Answer: They are countless. There are hundreds of editorial pages, separate, competing, and proudly independent. The country is swamped in radio and television commentators.

All of these opinion leaders often desperately search day after day for relevant and significant comment on our country and its future. In general they do an enlightening and impressive job. Our press is probably the best in the world and certainly the best this country has ever enjoyed. It is better informed. It is fairer. It is provocative. It is amusing. We live in a golden age of discussion and debate.

So what as happened to comment—pro and con—on the most significant arms control proposal of our time? Where are these guys? There has been far more in the press about the Chicago Bears quarterback Jim McMahon's headband and his alleged compliments for New Orleans women than there has been about a proposal that could carry with it the fate of the world.

Obviously, these commentators have thought about discussing this Gorbachev proposal. So come on fellas. Let us in on your thoughts. Since the Gorbachev proposals may have more to do with the fate of this nuclear world than any other development in a long time, why have they not given us the benefit of debate?

The great British political theorist, Walter Bagehot, years ago wisely observed that the strength of democracy lies precisely in the vigorous differences of opinion and the debate on the big crucial issues. Bagehot argued that the give and take of vigorous public debate resulted in wiser decisions in a democracy than in dictatorships that prevent public dissent.

And where does that big clash of opinion take place in America? In America most of the real public debate takes place not on the floor of the Congress, not in political campaigns, and not in campaigns for the Presidency. The continuous day-after-day, week-after-week debate that counts the debate that millions of Americans hear and see, the debate that really determines public opinion, takes place in the American media: in the newspapers, on radio, on television. This is the discussion that reaches tens of millions of Americans, and determines public opinion.

Certainly when the General Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union proposes the most drastic and far reaching arms control program in history, our great media should discuss it. Instead, the country suffers a yawning silence. It is as if Gorbachev had never spoken.

This Senator has said on the floor of this body that the Gorbachev proposal to banish nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth is so far out, so unrealistic, so impossible that it is ridiculous. Does that mean this Senator would flatly reject the Gorbachev initiative forthwith? Certainly not. As James Reston has written, the Gorbachev verification suggestions, for example, for on-the-spot investigation have great promise.

Also Gorbachev's proposal to negotiate an end to nuclear weapons testing is not new. But, if we can negotiate it, it would greatly serve the interest of peace, especially in concert with the new verification initiative. We should thoroughly examine Gorbachev's suggestion for banning chemical weapons. Why should we not pursue his startling idea for limiting the major conventional weapons that have much the same impact as nuclear weapons?

We have a golden opportunity to begin the most constructive negotiations with the Soviet Union to achieve peace since the beginning of the nuclear age. That is this Senator's judgment. That judgment may be wrong—seriously wrong. Possibly we should not touch any of these Gorbachev initiatives. I do not know, but what I do know is that follow them or not we ought to talk about them. We should debate them, discuss them. In this case silence is a shocking sign of weakness for this great democracy.

CORNELL KICKS THE PORK BARREL POLS IN THE TEETH

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, late last year over the objections of this Senator the Senate appropriated some $12 million without peer review and without competitive bids to Syracuse University for a research project. The award was vigorously protested by university leaders throughout the country. In the judgment of this Senator it was sheer pork barrel politics at its worst. The true victim of this policy of making awards based on sheer political power is not the university which can provide the higher quality and lower price research. The prime victim is the Nation's national interest and the American taxpayer.

Yesterday's New York Times carried an article that spoke most eloquently for a policy by the Congress of sticking strictly to peer review and competition for such research awards. One of the Nation's great universities, Cornell, declared that it will accept Federal research grants only if they are free of politics and subject to competitive bidding by colleges. And, Mr. President, Frank Rhodes, the president of Cornell University, was not just blowing smoke when he made that announcement. He was referring to a $10 million grant recently designated for a new campus center for a supercomputer whose capabilities far exceeds those of ordinary computers. The $10 million is contained in a bill that mentions Cornell as a recipient. Mr. President, this rejection by Cornell of an award most institutions would kill for speaks with the most profound eloquence of how deeply the university community resents the policy of the Congress passing out awards to universities to undergird a senatorial or congressional campaign.

Cornell is the first great university to speak from principle. They deserve a world of credit for doing so. Ten universities, including Cornell, were awarded grants totaling $65.6 million in the bill that passed the Congress last month. So far, Cornell is the only one to announce that it would not accept the money if merit review procedures were bypassed. It is rare but wonderful when any recipient of congressional goodies bites the hand that is feeding it. When it happens, the Congress should sit up and take notice. It is just possible that fair and honest, merit based allocations of congressional millions may turn out to be better politics than the usual awards to reelect incumbent Members of the Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article by Gene Maeroff in the Sunday, January 26, 1986, New York Times reporting the Cornell reaction, and a wire I have received as of December 20, 1985, from President Rhodes of Cornell, be placed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CORNELL SPURNS GRANTS GIVEN WITHOUT REVIEW

(By Gene I. Maeroff)

At a time when some universities are getting direct research grants by lobbying in Congress, Cornell University has declared it will accept such money only if it is free of politics and subject to competitive bidding by colleges.

Cornell, in a letter being distributed to its faculty, said it would welcome a merit review of its qualifications to get a $10 million grant recently designated for a new campus center for a supercomputer, whose capabilities far exceed those of ordinary computers. The funds are contained in a bill that mentions Cornell as a recipient.

The grant was provided without the knowledge of university officals, through the initiative of Senator Mark Hatfield, an Oregon Republican. Money would go to Cornell and an Oregon company helping to build the supercomputer unless someone else produces an equal or superior proposal.

"I determined that Cornell could not accept a funding award if it circumvented traditional merit-review procedures," said Frank Rhodes, the president of Cornell, which will continue to develop the supercomputer whether or not it gets the $10 million grant.

CHALLENGE TO PROCEDURE

What is at stake in Cornell's stand is the process through which individual universities seek funds and their supporters in Congress earmark the money, rather than allocating it after a merit review. Under such a review, all institutions competing for the funds submit proposals, which are evaluated by a panel of independent scientists.

The section of the Defense Department that is to distribute the grant, the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, said that it was setting up competition for the $10 million grant based on a merit review.

The bill's language relating to Cornell and the supercomputer project "unambiguously opens it to competition," said Craig I. Fields, deputy director of the engineering applications office of the agency.

"I imagine Cornell looked at the language and wanted the world to understand that they were not seeking special favor and were willing to stand on their merit," he said.

HARM TO RESEARCH SEEN

Cornell is among a few dozen major research universities that have condemned the direct grants in joint statements as harmful to research because such allocations do not ensure that money goes to those best qualified to use it. Cornell officials said they wanted to emphasize the need for an open allocations, free of political influence.

Smaller institutions and those without a long tradition of strong research prefer the direct grants because, they say, money awarded by panels of experts generally goes to a handful of prestigious universities.

"Frankly, for too long peer review has been a pipeline for the haves to continue and the have-nots to be shunted aside," said Charles Coffin, director of government relations at Northeastern University in Boston, which was designated in the same bill for a $13.5 million grant for engineering research. "'One man's peer review is another's old boy network,' as John Silber, the president at Boston University, has said."

GRANTS TOTAL $65.6 MILLION

Ten universities, including Cornell and Northeastern, were awarded grants totalling $65.6 million in the bill that was passed last month. So far, Cornell is the only one to announce it would not accept the money if merit review procedures were bypassed.

The other schools are Wichita State University in Kansas, the University of Nevada at Las Vegas, the University of Kansas, Iowa State University, a consortium of institutions known as the Oregon Graduate Center, Oklahoma State University, Rochester Institute of Technology and Syracuse University.

Some leaders in research hailed Cornell's decision.

"It is not easy in these times for a university president to bite a hand that is trying to feed his institution," said Robert Rosenzweig, president of the American Association of Universities, an organization of leading research universities. "But it certainly is admirable."

[Mailgram]

DECEMBER 20, 1985.

Senator WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
530 Dirksen Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

Amendment No. 1378 to the continuing resolution for the Department of Defense provides 10 million dollars for supercomputer development. These funds were later identified in the conference report with Cornell University. Cornell respects the responsibility of Congress to set priorities in broad policy areas such as access to supercomputers and restoring U.S. leadership in supercomputer technologies. The university attaches equal importance to the merit-review processes used by funding agencies to select specific projects for support.

Cornell University will not accept funding awards which bypass normal review procedures. We are told that Amendment No. 1378 was intended to help restore U.S. leadership in supercomputer technology, a purpose we fully support, but was not intended to circumvent such merit review. The university did not develop or support an initiative intended to bypass merit review.

FRANK H.T. RHODES,
President, Cornell University.

GENOCIDE: A STATE-SPONSORED CRIME

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, recently the Washington Post carried a review of John Simpson and Jana Bennett's book, "The Disappeared and the Mothers of the Plaza: The Story of the 11,000 Argentinians Who Vanished." This book serves as another reminder of the atrocities that are committed under some governments and of the urgent need for the Genocide Convention.

Ever since the massive, State-sponsored killing that occurred in Argentina between 1976 and 1983 has been publicized, many comparisons have been made between events there and those in Nazi Germany. The killing that occurred in Argentina was of a much smaller scale, but it serves as a harsh reminder that mankind has not changed since the Holocaust and that the possibility of genocide is still a real and present danger.

One of the most frightening aspects of the Argentine tragedy is that "the horror of it all went unremarked." The Post review comments that, "Evil was everywhere, every day. It was so normal, so accepted, so banal. And so few spoke out."

The reviewer seems surprised that most of those who did speak out were foreigners. This is disappointing, perhaps, but it should not be surpising. History indicates that people living under violent, repressive regimes tend to react with denial, fear, and, finally, numbness. The horror of events saps the emotional resolve of the people.

The present Alfonsin government deserves great credit for holding the former military regime accountable for its crimes. However, it can never make up for the 11,000 lives lost. Perhaps if other countries had spoken out more vehemently, early on, some of those lives would have been spared. It is important for other nations to speak on behalf of oppressed populations, to champion their basic rights and press for reforms. This is the underlying premise of the Genocide Convention, and this is why we need to ratify it.

MEASURING THE HYPE ON STAR WARS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, it is of critical importance to the Congress that the technological feasibility of the star wars program be well understood. Decisions involving billions in tax dollars should not be based on partial information or data which has been deliberately inflated to portray a rose picture.

What does it mean when a 103-foot Titan missile body is blown apart by a chemical laser in a test of star wars? Are we ready for deployment? Why was the test publicized so widely by the SDI office? Why has there been a steady drum beat of publicity from that office about breakthroughs in various SDI technology?

Here is an interesting contrast. The SDI office deals with some of the most highly classified studies and tests in the history of our country. They have knowledge of technology the Russians would die to have. So do they conduct their research in a closely guarded environment without public scrutiny? Hardly. Instead, they find every opportunity to make public their accomplishments and crow about successes.

This is a high visibility public relations strategy—a form of lobbying the American public and the Congress for more funding. The military officers in charge of the SDI program are Madison Avenue specialists in selling their product. They are salesmen in uniform, publicists, and entertainers, hoping to mold public opinion by a repetition of success stories until there is no questioning, no suspicion about the technical feasibility of star wars.

That is why there is no substitute for accurate press reporting on the SDI program. It is the responsibility of the American press to weigh and balance competing claims of success and failure. Out of that analysis may flow a national consensus.

Mr. President, I can think of no better example of this kind of evaluation than in a recent article of James McCartney of the Philadelphia Inquirer and I ask unanimous consent that his article from January 5, 1986, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelpha Inquirer, Jan. 5, 1986]

BEHIND THE HYPE, QUESTIONS PERSIST ON SPACE DEFENSE

(By James McCartney)

WASHINGTON.—The picture was right there on your television set in September: a 103-foot Titan missile, weighing 165 tons, under attack by a "Star Wars" laser.

There was a brilliant flash of light and the missile tilted, then collaped in flames.

The unquestionable visual message: President Reagan's controversial Star Wars program, which aims at developing an anti-ballistic missile system and is officially known as the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI), is working.

That message, and that television film, have become major objects of controversy in the scientific world today.

One of the nation's leading laser experts, Kosta Tsipis of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, described the film and the test itself as an effort at "bamboozling the public."

Both, he said, were misleading. "The experiment had absolutely nothing to do with the ability of a laser to shoot down a missile," Tsipis said in a telephone interview.

"It is a technology pursued in the 1970s. It was a very old laser. The lethality demonstration has been around for years. The wavelength of the laser is not appropriate to SDI purposes; it is too long.

"This is the kind of bamboozling of the public the SDI program is undertaking," he said.

SDI officials do not dispute that the laser—and the technology—used in the test was old. But they say that critics have "misunderstood" the test, that it was designed to determine how much heat was necessary to destroy a missile, not to show that the SDI Program had developed a missile-killing capability.

The incident illustrates the continuing uproar in the scientific world over the Star Wars program that has come into sharp focus in recent weeks.

As Reagan prepares to ask for substantial new funds for the program, Gen. James Abrahamson, SDI director, and his top aides have claimed sweeping scientific breakthroughs that they say have increased confidence that Star Wars will work. Abrahamson in recent weeks repeatedly has referred to "exciting" and "incredible" progress.

But many scientists are complaining publicly about what they term "hype" from those promoting the program and are questioning whether significant progress has been made in the $26 billion research program that has become the apple of Reagan's eye.

A detailed examination of the status of major scientific challenges facing the program, complemented by a series of interviews with scientists on both sides, reveals this picture:

No technical breakthroughs have been made in the central scientific and technical problem areas facing Star Wars, nor have any been claimed by Abrahamson and his top aides. Some progress has been made, however, in marginal areas.

It is still not possible to determine whether a defensive system against Soviet missiles that would protect the entire U.S. population is scientifically feasible. This was the goal set by Reagan when he announced the SDI program in March 1983.

No weapons or support systems for SDI have yet been developed to the point that it is clear that they will work.

No decisions have been made on the basic question of how a Star Wars system might be structured, its size or even what kinds of weapons would be used—or, as Abrahamson puts it, what its organizational "architecture" might be.

SDI officials say Reagan will request between $4.5 billion and $5 billion for the program in the new budget, about 63 percent more than Congress approved last year.

How much progress has been made on developing a Star Wars system?

To work, the system would have to be able to intercept thousands of Soviet missiles, many traveling at 17,000 m.p.h., and destroy them before they reached U.S. targets. It would require:

Space-based sensors to locate, identify and track missiles within four minutes after they were launched.

Weapons to destroy at least 2,100 Soviet missiles in the first three or four minutes after launched, at distances of up to 1,000 miles, and about 250 more in the next 25 minutes.

Computers to take information from the sensors and give instructions to the weapons, aiming them at missiles on flight-paths that would extend halfway around the world.

Here is a report on the progress, or lack of it, in each of these major areas as pieced together from current Strategic Defense Initiative literature, statements by SDI official and contractors and interviews with scientists:

SENSORS

According to John Scott of Energy-Environmental Research Group Inc., SDI sensor specialists, present technology does not permit the kind of "wide-scale and detailed resolution" of objects that would be necessary for Star Wars. Nor does it permit positive identification of thousands of objects in space. "The discrimination problem is a terrible one," he said.

Sensors today are also far too heavy to be space-based, and no way has been found to protect them so that they would not be subject to Soviet attack.

However, Abrahamson's special assistant, Maj. Simon Worden, said that the "premier breakthrough" in the last year has been the discovery of techniques to discriminate and identify targets, using particle beam and laser technology.

Said Thomas Karas of the congressional Office of Technology Assessment: "What they've got is an interesting idea. What they don't have is all the things it would take to make it work."

WEAPONS

Two major kinds of weapons are under intensive research: kinetic energy weapons, which would fire high-speed projectiles at about 20,000 m.p.h.; and "directed energy" or speed-of-light weapons, including lasers and partial beams.

Kinetic energy weapons are the most promising so far, but there is a basic problem: They are far too heavy and expensive. The most promising developments are in rocket-fired homing vehicles and what are called "rail guns," huge space-based machines that fire projectiles.

Today's homing vehicles weigh 7,000 pounds. The weight would have to be brought down to a few hundred pounds—or, ideally, a pound or two.

Current rail-gun technology would require a 100-ton system in space—nowhere near practical. In addition, the guns, which would have to fire hundreds and perhaps thousands of projectiles, can fire only a few before they wear out.

"The major problem," said Rodney Burton of G.T. Devices Inc., an SDI contractor, "Is designing an overall system. It's still very much research."

Among directed energy weapons, the hottest current candidates are what are called "free electron lasers" and neutral particle beams.

Lasers require huge amounts of energy, and recent decisions have been made to concentrate on land-based systems that would send beams of high-energy light to mirrors based 23,000 miles in space. These mirrors, in turn, would reflect the beams to "battle mirrors" orbiting about 100 miles over the Soviet Union.

But at this point, the high-powered beams destroy mirrors rather than reflect off them, and no way has been found to focus or aim beams accurately.

According to James Swingle, of Lawrence Livermore Laboratories, it also is not clear whether the type of lasers that would be necessary would be able to destroy possible targets.

"We still have a lot to learn about actually destroying missiles," he said. "It is not very well understood. This is very much a research program. There are several key areas that will need a lot of work to determine whether this system will work or not."

Particle beam weapons would have to operate in space, and they are also far too heavy at this point. Nor has it been established that they can destroy missiles. "We can cook a pot roast with one," said Damon VioVanielli, of New Mexico's Los Alamos Laboratories, "but we cannot kill a booster [missile]."

COMPUTERS

Because any Star Wars system would have to be able to process information from sensors about thousands—or even hundreds of thousands—of objects in space in a matter of minutes, officials acknowledge that computers are a key if any system is to work.

The "hardware," or the actual computer machinery, needed to handle this volume of information is already in sight, most computer experts say. One of them estimated recently that the system would have to process 600 million to 1 billion computations a second, while current technology can manage 500 million computations a second.

But "software"—how to program the computers to meet the Star Wars challenge—is a problem, Strategic Defense initiative officials concede.

Gerold Yonas, chief scientist for the SDI, said the issue is "whether you can write enough software to do the problem. . . . And, more than anything else, you have to have a system that is tested and tested and tested again."

At this point, no one has figured out how to test such a system.

Nor has anyone figured out how to put the necessary computers, if they did work, into space, or how to protect them once they got there.

One scientist, David Lorge Parnas, resigned recently from an SDI advisory panel on the ground that reliable software could never be developed.

"We cannot trust it," he told a Senate Armed Services subcommittee earlier this month, because the software could never be tested under realistic conditions. And without testing and de-bugging, he said, any system would be subject to "catastrophic failure."

MYTH OF THE DAY: THE $171.9 BILLION MYTH

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Halls of Congress are filled with the sounds of heart-rending cries of pain, gnashing of teeth, and possibly even the rending of pin-striped suits. What is causing this joblike misery? The possibility of having to reduce—get that, reduce—the deficit to $144 billion.

You might think that this $144 billion had appeared suddenly, like something that goes bump in the night. But no, I looked in the Gramm-Rudman bill and there it is written large—$144 billion.

What, then, is causing this outpouring of grief? The realization that a comforting myth—the 1986 deficit will be about $170 billion—has gone with the wind. For years, Congress has passed budget resolutions and then quietly exceeded the deficit "ceiling" contained in those resolutions. And nothing horrible happened. But this year something horrible is in the offing.

That horror is that the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget, looking at reality instead of myths, estimated that the fiscal year 1986 deficit will be around $220 billion instead of that mythical $171.9 billion. Therefore, the deficit will have to be reduced not from $171.9 to $144 billion but from roughly $210 billion, after the sequeston order, to $144 billion. That is the cause of all the grief.

Note the villian in this drama. It is not the $144 billion target for the deficit in fiscal year 1987. Rather, it is the gross underestimation of the 1986 deficit.

What is behind this underestimation? Did something unforeseen happen? Not on your life. The causes of this higher deficit are:

Failure to pass the budget reconcilation bill, which added $8 billion to the fiscal year 1986 deficit.

Low-ball estimates of the cost of agricultural programs to the tune of $15 billion.

Defense spending which exceeded the unrealistically low targets in the budget resolution by $7.8 billion.

Additional domestic spending which exceeded the resolution by $1.4 billion.

Finally, rosey economic forecasts which were not met and which added $12 billion to the deficit.

Not one of these causes was unforseen at the time the budget resolution passed the Senate. A number of my colleagues stood on this floor and warned that the fiscal year 1986 deficit would be substantially above the projected $171.9 billion. But our voices went unheeded.

Now those smoke and mirrors estimates are coming back to haunt us. Despite all the crocodile tears being shed, it is about time for some reality in place of myths.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

THE 1985 CHICAGO BEARS: THE HALAS LEGACY LIVES ON

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, early in 1920, A.E. Staley, a Decatur, IL, starch manufacturer and soybean entrepreneur, hired a young engineer from Chicago. This engineer was hired to make starch part-time and to help turn the good company football team into one of the best semiprofessional teams in the country. During the winter he made starch, met with other semipro teams to form the American Professional Football Association, and recruited new players.

After several years as an industrial sports team, Mr. Staley sold the team to the young engineer with the advice that he take the team to Chicago where he would be able to draw bigger crowds and make more money. The young man took that advice and thus was born the Chicago Bears professional football team. The young engineer was, of course, George Stanley Halas, the father of professional football.

As an owner, player, and coach, George Halas was responsible for a lot of what the NFL stands for today. He had high standards in his private and professional lives and he expected his players to maintain those same standards. George Halas loved the game of football and was always looking for ways to improve the game. Many of his innovations are still in use today.

He always tried to recruit the best players. Their names are famous: Red Grange, Sid Luckman, Gale Sayers, Dick Butkus, Mike Ditka or Walter Payton. George Halas knew that success was built on a combination of talent and desire, and that's why I think that Mr. Halas would be very proud of the 1985 Chicago Bears.

This year's players have talent, desire and that indefinable something that makes for a great professional athlete. They work hard together. They are a true team. Those of us from Illinois are indeed proud to be represented by these men, who have worked so hard and earned the respect of their colleagues in the NFL and of the whole country. When they were 4–0, there were nonbelievers. When they were 8–0, there were still people who were nonbelievers. The Bears didn't let that bother them. They just kept playing their own brand of professional football and now there can be no more nonbelievers.

I think it's fitting in this 20th Super Bowl year, that the team founded by the man who meant more to the growth of the National Football League than any other has won the world's championship.

George Halas isn't with us this year in person, but he is in spirit. It is the spirit of a man whose words were proved true again yesterday in New Orleans: "I do believe we gave a lot of people pleasure today. It's a great game, a great game."

REPORT ON U.S. POSITION AROUND THE WORLD

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, beginning in late December, I undertook an investigatory trip that took me to some of the key locations around the world where the United States has vital interests. I have reported to President Reagan my observations on the U.S. position in some of the most strategically important areas of the world and I have also sent a letter to Secretary of State Shultz relative to my concern about reported plans of our Government to provide a $500 million arms sale package to Red China.

The long and the short of my report to the President is that while U.S. Armed Forces are in good or excellent condition around the world, a disturbing perception exists in certain foreign countries that the United States is not living up to past promises to support the defense capabilities of our friends.

The point of my letter to Secretary Shultz is to protest reports of United States participation in seeking to enhance and modernize the military forces of Communist China without paying adequate attention to the threat this activity would pose to other nations in the far Pacific.

Mr. President, in the interests of communicating these first-hand observations to my colleagues and the American people, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the two letters be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington, DC, January 21, 1986.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Two days after Christmas, I began a trip that took me around the world for the purpose of visiting not only our own bases and the bases of allies, but friends that we have around the world. I will keep this report as short as I can, even though that might be a little bit difficult.

Beginning in Hawaii, I found the Navy, the Army, and the Air Force to be in good condition. There are shortages, naturally. There have been shortages in spares throughout the military for a good number of years, but recently that situation has been improving. I was most disturbed by being briefed there to learn that about 800 different intrusions have been made by the Soviets over the Pacific with Badger and Bear bombers. Some of these incursions have approached the Philippines and, how far they have gone into the central Pacific, I don't believe anyone really knows.

From Hawaii, we traveled to Korea where I found our ground forces to be in excellent condition; likewise, our air forces. Our Ambassador to that country, Mr. Walker, is one of the most outstanding Ambassadors I feel that we have. The people in South Korea seem most friendly to the United States, but naturally, the people in North Korea do not quite hold that feeling. I inquired as to the possibility of disruption or attempted disruption of the Olympic Games in 1988 by the North Koreans, and I have to report to you that is a worry, although I am sure you have been briefed on this. It is not something that is worrisome to the point that they feel there are no solutions, but there is the fact that they can attempt troubles.

From there, I stopped very briefly in Japan, where I met Ambassador Mike Mansfield whom, as you know, is doing an outstanding job of representing our country, expressing our wishes and our desires. We had a very friendly chat, not long enough, but I just wanted to report to you of the excellence of his service.

Then, on to Taiwan. I know the great and high regard that you hold for Taiwan. Even though it was Mr. Carter, not you, who withdrew recognition from the Republic of China and transferred that honor to the Peoples' Republic on the Mainland, I feel that the agreements with Taiwan under the Taiwan Relations Act have not been and are not being fully complied with. Instead we seem to be bent on assisting with the modernization of Red China's military capabilities. I may hold hearings before the Armed Services Committee sometime later this spring to examine the arms assistance the United States is giving to the Mainland.

Taiwan badly needs new aircraft. They are flying the F-104 long given up by our own Air Force and by the German Air Force, and they are using the F-5 which is rapidly becoming antiquated. I repeat to you what I have said to you before, the F-20 would be an ideal solution to the aircraft problem of Taiwan, and I see absolutely no reason at all, under any agreement, that we cannot furnish this weapons system to the Taiwanese and to give them other equipment they badly need which I do not care to relate at this point.

I repeat to you, Mr. President, what I have often said. I don't think any of us or our children and possibly our grandchildren will even live to see the day the Peoples' Republic of China becomes a viable nation with power in this world. If they could ever rid themselves of the communist government, they could become, in my opinion, the strongest economic nation in the world, but I don't believe for one single moment that communism will leave those shores.

From there, we traveled to Singapore, where I had the real pleasure of meeting the Prime Minister and discussing very briefly his situation. As you know, he has put together an armed force of about 60,000 men, with some 200,000 reserves, and he is building an air force with the help of our own Air Force. There is an economic problem in that country, created by the reduced quantity of oil that we and other countries are buying. But I have to tell you, to travel the crowded streets, to try to get into the crowded stores, makes me question the depth or severity of that recession. As you know, it is a most delighful country, in fact one of the most beautiful in the entire world, and the fact that it sits at the mouth of the Straits of Malacca, which I believe is the only Strait left in this world not dominated by the Soviets or one that could be dominated very quickly, makes it become of immediate importance to us.

Our next stop was the atoll of Diego Garcia in the middle of the Indian Ocean and I would suggest that someday, if time permits, you pay a visit to this most interesting installation. What our country has been able to do with that very valuable spot on earth is almost unbelievable. I am happy to report that the leadership is good, the morale is good, and our decision to cooperate with the British in maintaining the space is, to me, one of the most vital strategic decisions our country has ever made.

The next stop was the little island of Masira off the coast of Oman, a place by the way, that I landed at once in a while during World War II. It is a desolate place. It is very difficult to find even a bush growing, but the British are there helping the Omanian Air Force and I believe everything is in good order. While it was not possible for me to visit with the Sultan of Oman becasue of a little mixup in my scheduling, I was able to see the fabulous growth that has occurred in that country over the last fifteen years and it is almsot unbelievable. I feel that the Sultan is a good friend of ours. His first interests are his own country, the education of his people, and the righting of wrongs that were perpetrated by his predecessor, his father.

Next, we visited Saudi Arabia, first the large Saudi air base on the island of Dahran, where we had a thorough briefing of one of the most wonderful tactical installations I believe can be found anyplace on earth. There, at the level of the pilots and the squadron, I found a dissatisfaction that I found wherever we went over the fact that we have not carried out our promise to sell them more F-15 aircraft. This was borne out to me by a visit, in Riyadh, with the Minister of Defense, Prince Sultan.

Mr. President, there in Saudi Arabia, I found a disturbing repetition of matters I had been hearing wherever I had been, with the possible exception of Korea, that we, the United States, are not living up to our promises—the promises to supply weapons. Now, I know the great reluctance of the Congress to supply weapons to Arab countries because of the tremendous influence of Israel on the Congress but, nevertheless, if we are going to make promises, we must keep them, and I urgently appeal to you to use your power to see that these promises are kept. We are beginning to be looked upon, not just as a paper tiger, but as a country who makes promises only not to keep them. I fully understand the political power exerted on Congress to influence these decisions relative to the Arab countries, but I think we have to sit down and take a very modern, realistic look at this whole area that I call the Islamic Crescent, for if we do not stand by our friends there, we could find ourselves in serious trouble. This is a situation I would enjoy discussing with you at any time.

From Riyadh, we stopped briefly in Geneva to visit with several members of the government and to visit an old and dear friend of mine. The last two days of the trip we spent in London, where I visited the missile site at Greenham, and it is truly a remarkable bit of construction. It is impossible to describe it to you by letter but I am sure you are acquainted with it. I just wanted you to know that everything is in good shape there. The trip back across the Atlantic was, as usual, very interesting with a short stop at Shannon, Ireland, for the necessary replenishments.

In summing all of this up, Mr. President, I think we should start paying very close attention to the promises we make. I find, not too much, but a little bit of questioning about our country and its intentions. I am particularly impressed with one growing fact that grows stronger with every trip—the world is changing in more ways than we know and the world is becoming less and less dependent upon the United States.

I have seen, in my journeys, a tremendous amount of construction, none of it by American companies. I see jet airliners and aircraft not made in the United States. I have found practically no American cars abroad, so, Mr. President, I never thought I would live to see the day when that would happen, but I think it is high time that the policies you are advocating become adopted by not just the American Congress, but by the American people. If we are going to cut a road that we can follow with freedom and ease, we had better get back to the old idea that we work, and work, and work.

With all respect,

BARRY GOLDWATER.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington, DC, January 22, 1986.

Hon. GEORGE P. SHULTZ,
Secretary of State,
Washington, DC.

DEAR GEORGE: Whether or not you will ever receive this letter will not prevent my writing it in the hopes that you might see it.

I have been made aware of the fact that the United States is considering selling to the People's Republic of China a number of rather sophisticated military items coming to about $500 million.

George, you know my feeling about Red China so possibly you can throw this in the prejudiced pile, but I cannot help but voice my complete disagreement with any decision such as the one that is being contemplated, if it is being contemplated.

I have often said that we will never see the day when the People's Republic of China is not a communist government. We will never see the day when they are important to us economically, strategically, or any other way, and by continuing to do the type of thing I am referring to in this letter, we are alienating South Korea, Japan, and most of all, Taiwan.

I know your feelings on Taiwan. I know the President's feelings on Taiwan, and you know my feelings on the same place. I don't want to see them threatened by the People's Republic of China, yet the sale of these items will do exactly that. Never in our history have we needed a friend as we need Taiwan today—not only Taiwan, but Korea, the Philippines, and the rest of the far Pacific countries that the People's Republic of China means no good to. I just want to strongly protest this gesture. I pray that you will not allow it to happen. It has been bad enough that we have recognized the People's Republic, so let's not go any further with this rather useless gesture.

With respect and best wishes,

BARRY GOLDWATER.

MILITARY REFORM IN AMERICA

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, to follow through on my remarks that I intended to introduce into the RECORD articles appearing in the Air University Review for September-October relative to reorganization of the military, I will today introduce another one, entitled "Military Reform in America," by Dr. Allan R. Millett.

Dr. Millett has taken more or less a historic view of military reform in America. It is extremely interesting reading and being a great believer in the engraving found on the steps of the Archives Building, "What is past is prologue, study the past," I think my colleagues would enjoy reading this, just to have a better grasp of why constant attention is necessary to keep every organization, whether it is military, business, or political, up on its toes, living in the present, not the present we necessarily like, but the present as it necessarily is.

I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Serving soldiers from time immemorial have recognized that dictated change does not always bring increased military effectiveness, the basic criterion they apply to reform. An unnamed soldier in the army of republican Rome recognized the problem:

"We trained hard . . . but it seemed that every time we were beginning to form up into teams, we would be reorganized. I was to learn later in life than we tend to meet any new situation by reorganizing; and a wonderful method it can be for creating the illusion of progress while producing confusion, inefficiency, and demoralization."

The Duke of Cambridge, who witnessed the impulse for reform in Queen Victoria's England, summed up the thinking conservative's view of all reform, civil and military: "There is a time for all things; there is even a time for change; and that is when it can no longer be resisted." Whether the parent state is autocratic, revolutionary, or democratic, its armed forces are not likely to view military reform as an unconditional good. As Alexis de Tocqueville observed, however, the armed forces of democracies had a special problem because they were altered so radically in peacetime periods between wars. The change was not necessarily dictated by size but represented a fundamental challenge of the values of the standing forces. In times of peace, democracies ignored their standing forces, for they knew that in wartime the "nation in arms," for better or worse, would go to the battlefield with a new set of criteria for evaluating military leadership, organization, weapons, and tactics. Skeptical of the adaptiveness of peacetime forces, democracies would dictate that their military establishments would fight and change their institutional character at the same time.

Like many of his other observations in Democracy in America, Tocqueville had more to say about military reform in Europe as the seasons of American military reform may or may not coincide with belligerency. They certainly do not match the outcomes of wars. For example, in comparing the results of the Mexican War (1846-48) with the Spanish-American War (1898), one can conclude that both were smashing victories in terms of national objectives. The War with Mexico outstripped the War with Spain in its degree of mismanagement and the near perilous commitment of inadequate military power. Yet it was the 1898 war that set off more than a decade of land force reform, largely because it occurred simultaneously with the Progressive Era. Nor does the importance of the war dictate the degree of reform. The American Revolution gave rise to a generation of rhetoric but prompted little change to the militia system inherited from the colonial era. The War of 1812, in contrast, created the political environment that brought significant change to the War and Navy departments. Nor does military reform require the shock of wars badly won or lost that galvanizes public outcry. Reform in the twenty years before the Spanish-American War and World War II proceeded with minimal public attention, yet produced important changes in both the U.S. Army and the Navy.

If military reform is purposeful change that improves the U.S. Armed Forces (i.e., the product of public policy), it is not a phenomenon that occurs in either linear or cyclical fashion across time. Even "improve" can mean several things. By strictly military criteria, reform should increase the likelihood that the armed forces will perform their missions in war and peace with increased effectiveness, but reform in the United States seldom meets the standard of pure functionalism. Indeed, some of the most deep-seated notions of military change have included both explicit and hidden agendas that had little to do with military effectiveness in the direct, tangible sense. For example, at one time or another, the federal government has used military reform to encourage infant industry, build continental railroads, teach young males hygiene and physical fitness, further racial and gender integration in the larger society, and educate generations of civil and marine engineers. In fact, American military reform probably includes only one constant: it must not endanger civilian control of the military. In any event, the reason why military reform defies simple explanation is that it has worked in five distinct aspects of the institutional development of the armed forces:

The organization of the four services that comprise the armed forces and the network of civil, political agencies with which they work;

Technology;

The social composition of the armed forces and the set of formal regulations and informal mores that determine social relationships in the armed forces;

The nature and functions of officership in the armed forces; and

The development of operational doctrine and tactics for force employment.

Reform in each of these five areas has built its own set of historical patterns, and the causal relationship between reform movements has not been nearly so direct as some military reformers believe. In fact, it is closer to the historical experience to recognize that successful reform in one area may retard improvement in others. Such unanticipated outcomes have occurred so often that they explain some of the military predisposition to make change slowly, especially in peacetime. On the other hand, compartmentalized reform may have no effect at all outside its narrow sphere of influence. Thus, military reform in the United States refuses to fit neatly into a historical pattern that points clearly to reform's future.

ORGANIZATION

For their first century, the three existing services (the U.S. Army, Navy, and Marine Corps) developed a dual structure that gave their administrative headquarters in Washington centralized control. Operating forces in the field had little influence on service policy because the service civilian and military staffs controlled budgets and regulation writing, largely to satisfy civilian oversight. Effective power to run the Army rested with the department and bureau chiefs of the War Department. Their counterparts in the Navy's bureaus and the Marine Corps' small headquarters staff had similar power. In wartime, however, this system normally collapsed, since the standing procedures and limited numbers of personnel could not cope with mobilization. By the end of the nineteenth century, the services moved to close the line-staff division through the creation of service general staffs. The Navy began the process with the establishment of a General Board (1900) and the Office of the Chief of Naval Operations (1915), but the Army went further in centralizing military control with its War Department General Staff (1903). The Air Force duplicated the Army system in 1947, although Strategic Air Command established a semifeudalistic autonomy like that maintained by some portions of the Navy's support establishment. In the twentieth century, the general staff reform movement finally ensured that line officers would dominate their services and provide authoritative advice to their civilian superiors, but Congress has worked to counter this trend by providing staff access through the funding process. The career of Admiral Hyman Rickover is only the most notable example of technocratic insurgency.

The pressure for interservice collaboration—some coming from civilians, some from military officers—coincided with the growth of the general staff movement and in some ways competed with it. The Joint Board (1903) coped with such joint service responsibilities as coast defense, aviation policy, and amphibious operations, as well as advising the service secretaries on war plans. Replaced by the Joint Chiefs of Staff system in World War II, the Joint Board showed characteristics of joint planning that still prevail. The board had only an advisory role; it could not make decisions, which required active civilian participation and a willingness to decide. The joint planning system dictated that interservice disagreement would surface, whether the issue was the defense of Subic Bay or the management of military space programs. The organizational response to this condition after 1947 has been to increase the power of the Secretary of Defense and, much less significantly, the power of the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff. Drawing from service experiences, the reformers have assumed that more centralization alone will improve joint collaboration. But service-level centralization rested on a different problem: the ascendancy of line officers in service planning within a system of civilian control. The debate on joint planning now focuses on force employment issues that require strategic guidance from political authority, something noticeably absent throughout the entire history of the general staff reform movement. During the one period in which that guidance came with a vengeance, the tenure of Robert S. McNamara as Secretary of Defense (1961-67), the entire system shuddered and eventually rebelled.

TECHNOLOGY

Since the earliest bureaucratization of the armed forces, technological change developed as a constant focus of military reform. Only the issue of technological adaptation has been a constant, for the pattern of change itself has varied. In the design of military vehicles and their different power plants, reform has normally wedded government designers and civilian innovators and producers, linked by a delicate balance of military need, psychic satisfaction, and monetary profits. Through World War I, this military-civilian collaboration produced sailing ships, the first ironclads and steel warships, Army wagons and their braying "power plant," railroad systems (most notably during the Civil War), automobiles and trucks, and airplanes. Although the pattern of collaboration has continued into the 1980s, it has been affected by the growing specialization of military vehicles, increased unit cost, and the length and complexity of the design and procurement process. Procurement, however, since the Frigate Act of 1794, has always been a political issue, which it will remain as long as Congress exercises its fiscal powers. Changes in military vehicles, an area of high need and high cost whether the vehicles carry weapons or simply provide transportation, will continue to be in the forefront of technological development because the mastery of time and space remains a central criterion for military effectiveness.

Ordnance development, on the other hand, has been made principally on the arsenal model, since military ammunition, cannon, and fusion warheads have little commercial appeal. Ordnance development had depended more on nation-against-nation military assessments of weapons effectiveness than military-civilian comparisons, which shape evaluations of vehicles. Except for the occasional intervention of individual inventors (e.g., John Browning and John Garand) into the arsenal system, ordnance development has been the province of military bureaucracies, which tend to balance promised increases in firepower with questions of tactical effectiveness and logistical feasibility. If there is any historical trend in weapons development, it has been that the capabilities of the platform vehicles have often exceeded the ordnance they carried, at least until the development of nuclear and terminally guided conventional munitions.

The change of military infrastructure reflects a different historical pattern. Military investments in construction (e.g., coastal defense fortifications, naval and military bases and airfields, civil engineering projects) has declined and been replaced by investment in electronic command and control systems with global and extraterrestrial reach. Like the development of vehicles, both military construction and electronics have depended on close military-scientific-commercial interaction. At an ever-accelerating pace, the application of electronics for military purposes has dictated a bond between commercial exploitation and military application that cannot be divided. The trend began with the development of the telegraph, radio, and the electrification of warships into the use or radars, computers, infrared sensing, satellite and aerial photography, and microwave/space relay communications. In a sense, the growing importance of military information processing and analysis reflects the more widespread shift of the American economy from industrial to service entrepreneurship. Whether the microchip and solid-state circuitry will prove as important a quantum leap in the effectiveness of military command as the vacuum tube remains to be seen.

Although ideally the adaptation of military technology might be separated from domestic partisan politics (as distinguished from bipartisan military pork-barrel politics), such has not been the case, largely because military procurement always seems to carry social and political benefits of little military relevance. Historically, military procurement has been used to stimulate cutting-edge industrial giants (in shipbuilding, steel, and aviation, for example), to encourage small businesses, to strengthen labor unions and minority employment opportunities, and to sustain a broad academic-industrial research and development infrastructure. Whatever the wisdom of this public policy, it politicizes technological reform, since both major political parties have populist factions that see corporation-governmental collaboration in terms of imperialist intervention abroad and economic exploitation at home. Despite the yearning of technologists, the concerns of the laboratory, factory, and military user alone are unlikely to shape technological reform.

SOCIAL COMPOSITION, STRUCTURE, AND BEHAVIOR

Since the first ill-fated campaigns by the Army into the Northwest Territory and the first cruises of the frigate Navy against Barbary pirates and French privateers, American military commanders have argued that they could do much better in the field with better men. Those "better men" should not desert and should stay sober (at least on duty), obey superior officers and NCOs, and show some interest in training and physical fitness. They might even fight. In peacetime, the military recruiters did not have much success in drawing sturdy yeomen and fishermen or intelligent clerks into the ranks and crews, but throughout the nineteenth century they did attract pliant immigrants, wayward youths, and occupationally displaced workers into the peacetime services. Fortunately, they knew, the services would be more representative of the nation's male talent in wartime because volunteering and conscription (usually a subtle combination of both) would bring citizen-soldiers and citizen-sailors into the Army and Navy. These servicemen would not stay for the following peace. Indeed, until the twentieth century, they often went home legally even before the war ended. The services knew that these phenomena existed and tried to close the quality gap between the peacetime and wartime services. They are still trying.

Most personnel reforms designed to attract quality people—defined as trainable men in good health—came from the services themselves in collaboration with Congress. The reforms focused on "more"—more pay, more rank, more and better food, improved living conditions, more off-duty recreation, more health care and retirement benefits, more religion. They also focused on "less"—less corporal punishment, less issue alcohol, less menial work, less capricious discipline by martinet superiors. In terms of eliminating the unattractive aspects of service life, the armed forces often found themselves allied with unlikely co-reformers that ranged from the antislavery movement to legal rights groups. While they may have had the rights of servicemen in mind, civilian reformers had little interest in military effectiveness, having more concern in using the military as a laboratory for social experimentation.

The armed services had a good idea of what sort of people they did not want in the ranks, except under duress, Southern and Eastern Europeans, Jews, black Americans, Indians, Hispanics, Asians, and women all found entry and career advancement impossible or difficult at best, but as their political power grew in American society, so too did their influence on military personnel policies. In some cases, the armed forces moved more rapidly toward equal opportunity than civilian institutions; sometimes they did not. In any event, wartime service normally paved the way for better military careers, for the twentieth-century American military establishment could not defend its insular possessions or man the forces committed to forward, collective defense after 1945 without modifying its social structure. Enlisted service for a special group usually led eventually to admission to the officer ranks, sometimes at the insistence of civil rights groups with influence on Congress. With greater access to formal education and powerful formal and information sanctions against other than meritocratic advancement, minorities have demonstrated that increased military effectiveness may be compatible with social reform. The lesson, however, has not been painlessly learned by all parties or free of ambiguity.

OFFICERSHIP

Military professionals did not find the North American continent hospitable from the earliest settlement, as the travels of Miles Standish and John Smith attest. The low state of career officers had nothing to do with the requirement for their services, which the Indians and French kept at a high level. Little had changed by the end of the Revolution, as Hamiltonian Federalists learned when they tried to create an academy and cadre of professionals to train their "federal select militia."

The Navy had less difficulty finding a professional identity for its officers, since the occupation of mariner/ships officer had high status in a country that boasted a world-class merchant marine. Moreover, a Navy officer could show his commitment to the entrepreneurial seacoast culture by seeking prize-money like his privateering brethren and by his diplomatic efforts to expand American commerce abroad.

Army officers—except those who served as explorers, surveyors, and civil engineers—had little to offer the nation; even in wartime, they shared preferment with citizen-officers whose overall excellence and ability to recruit made them more valuable than regulars. Even the establishment of the Military Academy (1802) and Naval Academy (1845) did not advance the concept of special skill and public trust, for appointments to the academies soon became part of the political patronage system. Not until the post-Civil War period did academy graduates dominate the services, and then the Army had to accommodate officers whose volunteer wartime service drew them to a postwar career. Moreover, the larger society no longer ignored former wartime commanders (indeed, it elected some president of the nation), and it also rewarded a host of technicians, inventors, organizers, managers, and scientists who happened to wear uniforms.

The reform of officership in the U.S. Armed Forces largely came from within the officer corps itself and from officers who believed that peacetime education for wartime command defined military professionalism. Some of the officers' inspiration came from the debacle of the Civil War, some from foreign military practices, and some from the example of civilian professionals and businessmen.

By World War I, all the services had taken giant stops to establishing preparation for wartime command (or operational staff service) as the fundamental justification for military professionalism. The signs of reform were everywhere: in school systems for midcareer education, in the movement toward promotion by merit and board selection, by personal efficiency reporting, by the rotation through line and staff assignments. The giants of World War I and II emerged from this system and gave it its ultimate sanction. To their credit, the officers of the Army (Sherman, Upton, Schofield, Wood, Pershing, Marshall), Navy (Luce, Mahan, Sims, Pratt, Fullam, King), and Marine Corps (Barnett, Lejeune, Russell, Holcomb) who championed the professionalization of officership did so most often in the face of (at best) public apathy. They also persisted in the face of opposition from many of their fellow officers, who preferred to rely on their political contacts, bureaucratic expertise, and romantic notions of charismatic battlefield leadership. The career officer as "manager of state violence" owed little to civilian inspiration or assistance. As long as professionalization could be squared with access to officership based on education and performance and did not menace civilian control, political leaders accepted it.

The cold war, however, resurrected the dual definition of officership common in the nineteenth century, destroying the dominant identity of the officer-as-commander and rational planner of military operations. Officers explored space and the ocean depths, not just mountains and harbors; officers functioned as corporate managers and technicians in massive installations and nuclear laboratories, not railroads and gun factories; officers guided interservice and coalition commands and military assistance groups in foreign lands, not just negotiated with the Cheyennes and Fiji Islanders; officers moved freely throughout the national security bureaucracy rather than simply in and out of their service bureaus. In a sense, the power to serve the public good corrupted the core defintion of officership, setting the stage for a collective malaise triggered by the Vietnam War. Since much of the crisis in professionalism was rooted in the changed values that the officer corps itself had encouraged, there should be little wonder that officers have preferred to carry on the redemptive or redefining process themselves rather than allow Congress, academic gurus, and the media to prescribe ill-suited cures for their unique diseases of the spirit. The general social pattern of professions reforming others but not themselves has little to recommend it.

OPERATIONAL AND TACTICAL DOCTRINE

The general concepts and procedures that guide the employment of military forces in campaigns and battles emerged in the nineteenth century as the intellectual core of officership, an acquired mix of art and science. Unlike strategy, so dependent on transient political goals and subject to the whims of wartime leaders, operational and tactical doctrine required a beguiling mix of universal principles and situational adaptations that fused the capabilities of one's own forces and one's enemy as well as considered the physical environment in which those forces would meet one another. Moreover, operations and tactics demanded that a commander do something, not just think about it—a responsibility that required emotional and physical sturdiness, not just intellectual skill. In land warfare, battles moved from sequential concepts (the artillery fired, the infantry attacked or defended, the cavalry skirmished and then pursued) to the combination and integration of arms in simultaneous combat, complicated further by the advent of the airplane. At sea, single ship actions progressed to squadron, then fleet surface operations, then major naval campaigns that included submarines, fleet aviation, surface combatants, and amphibious forces. Fighting with allies in the world wars, in Korea, and in Vietnam further complicated the crafting and adjustment of doctrine, as did the introduction of the concept of deterrence based on the threat of nuclear weapons. The technical lethality of weapons in terms of the volume of fire such weapons could produce over ever-expanding distances presented additional problems to doctrinal reformers. Technological anxiety (will our weapons work as well as the enemy's?) reinforced organizational anxiety (will our system of command and logistics suffice when Murphy's Law replaces the current SOP?).

Operational and tactical reform in the U.S. Armed Forces has been largely the province of the officer corps, which has done a surprisingly good job in peacetime in changing the services' operational concepts. The old saw that the military refights the last war bears little reality to the process of adaptation, since much doctrine comes from a desire not to fight the last war again. Whether the reformed doctrine actually fits the next war is, of course, another matter, but the Armed Forces of the United States at least had the pleasure of fighting World War II almost precisely as they thought they would in terms of operational concepts, if not in terms of place of timing. Perhaps that experience was too satisfying.

Doctrinal reform has invariably created serious internal disputes within the officer corps of every service, a condition that makes intervention by outsiders especially unwelcome. Doctrinal adaptation is like a civil war, noteworthy for the high stakes and the intensity of commitment it spawns. Outside intervention may be important but is never fully welcomed, even by the winners. When doctrinal reform coincides with other types of reform, however important and well-intentioned, the effect on a service may be wrenching. The process is even more complicated when the doctrine requires interservice negotiation, in part because joint doctrine creates additional opportunities for extramilitary intervention. Thus, the development of air power doctrine in this century, especially when it became linked with nuclear weapons, proceeded with consistent messiness from the Billy Mitchell era through the "revolt of the admirals" in 1949 into the questions of control of helicopters, close air support squadrons, and military transports. Similar disputes have characterized the question of special operations forces, whether they were Marine raiders in the Pacific, Ranger battalions in the European theater, or Special Forces detachments in Vietnam.

The importance of operational and tactical reform is seldom in question, but no intelligent military leader can regard it as a pleasant experience. The only more perilous situation is to remain wedded to the status quo and find that adaptation must be built on the burning wreckage of one's materiel and the bodies of one's comrades.

The history of the U.S. Armed Forces provides many examples of adaptation across the entire range of organizational, technological, social, professional-occupational, and operational concerns that have drawn reformers' interest. But reform has seldom been driven by concerns for military effectiveness alone. Eventually, reform, because of its political nature, may achieve legitimacy with the nation's political leadership, but it also carries a cost—a cost extracted in time, money, interservice harmony, and the full faith and confidence that should characterize civil-military relations. Military reform is much like the very nature of republican government itself. As Federalist Congressman Fisher Ames observed, an autocratic government is like a beautiful sailing ship, fast and steady in a fair breeze, but prone to floundering in foul weather. A republic is like a raft, ungainly, unsightly, and nearly uncontrollable even in calm waters. But it never sinks, even in a gale. Nevertheless, one's feet are always wet.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, what is the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is in morning business.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I have no desire to determine what will take place on the floor of the Senate. That is not my responsibility. However, we have all been advised that as of today we would be back on the Conrail bill. I am wondering what is the intention of the leaderhsip as far as going back on the Conrail bill. Although I love the Halls of the Senate, I am not just anxious to sit here and twiddle my thumbs. If the manager could indicate what his intentions are, the Senator from Ohio would appreciate it.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the manager of the bill is certainly willing to go forward this afternoon. I know the Senator from Louisiana had an amendment which he was going to offer. I thought he was going to offer it today. It is my understanding that he will not be prepared to offer it today.

There is a possibility that the senior Senator from Illinois might have an amendment to be offered today. We are trying to ascertain that.

Mr. President, I am perfectly prepared to go forward with the bill today, if Senators would like to either offer amendments or make speeches.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is prepared to go forward today, as soon as the manager of the bill or the majority leader puts us back on the bill. Does the manager have anything further he would like to say at this time?

Mr. DANFORTH. I am not prepared right now, but I will have some comments when we get back on the bill. I anticipate that will be in something like 20 minutes or a half-hour.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Could we tentatively agree that at about a quarter to 2 we will reconvene on the bill and the Senator and I can proceed to discuss certain matters?

Mr. DANFORTH. That may very well be.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I thank the Senator and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

CONRAIL SALE AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending business.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 638) to amend the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 to provide for the transfer of ownership of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to the private sector, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

Pending:

Danforth Amendment No. 1437, in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, at approximately 3 o'clock, it is my intention to propose a unanimous-consent request which would have the effect of treating my subsitute amendment to S. 638 as an original text for the purpose of further amendment.

I do this for several reasons. First of all, the Senate customarily treats substitute amendments as original text for the purpose of further amendment in order to simplify the amendment process. Second, since my amendment is a substitute amendment, if it is agreed to there would be no text of S. 638 as it was originally introduced for the Senate to consider. The original S. 638 has been modified as a result of extensive committee deliberations. These changes, which reflect a number of concerns raised against the original Conrail sale proposal, are all contained in my substitute amendment. Therefore, it is pointless for the Senate to consider what is outdated text. The old text does not enjoy any support either by proponents or opponents of the Conrail sale to Norfolk Southern and does not require Senate consideration.

I would urge my colleagues to agree to this request. It has no material impact on their ability to amend my substitute which will continue to be amendable in two degrees as the original S. 638 would have been.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I will address the body on some of the problems with respect to the Conrail legislation and then at the appropriate time I will also discuss somewhat the procedures under which we are operating.

Mr. President, diversions of rail traffic from Eastern and Midwestern railroads to the giant Norfolk Southern-Conrail combine will have profound implications for rail competition in the region.

What will be the effect on those railroads?

I point to the report of the U.S. Railway Association, which states as follows:

> Carriers both large and small will be affected by diversion. CSX Corp., with its major overlap of network with Conrail/Norfolk Southern, will suffer significant loss in absolute dollars. Smaller carriers, such as Grand Trunk Western; Illinois Central Gulf; Chicago and North Western; and Soo/Milwaukee will lose substantial volumes of traffic in relation to their traffic bases.

USRA states that the larger carriers in the West will not escape the effects of diversions.

Norfolk Southern estimates that traffic diversions to its system will total $262.4 million.

But CSX estimates that it will lose $400 million of business just from its own lines.

The Midwestern regional railroads are afraid they will be eaten alive by the Norfolk Southern-Conrail giant, and after reading the USRA report, I agree entirely with them.

There is a distinct possibility that traffic diversions to Norfolk Southern-Conrail could so weaken the financial position of the Midwestern regional carriers that Federal intervention will be necessary to prevent a collapse.

It is, indeed, ironic that the administration, in its rush to unload Conrail, is setting the stage for a repeat of a regional rail collapse on a scale comparable to the Penn Central fiasco.

And how do the taxpayers fare in this sale? Not very well.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, the Federal Governmment would be paid about $1.4 billion for the sale of Conrail. But we would lose about $400 million in tax revenues and $800 million in the future interest and dividend payments between now and 1990. I will return to the same subject subsequently in order to point out the President's comments in connection therewith and the facts as I understand them to be.

The losses I have just mentioned according to the CBO do not take into account what we will lose in interest and dividends between 1991 and 2011, when the debt becomes due.

The Federal Government under this scheme would get $200 million for an asset whose net worth has been calculated at over $3 billion, and in which the taxpayers of this country have invested over $7 billion.

Again, this is how this would happen.

The amended and restated financing agreement between the U.S. Railway Association and Conrail requires Conrail to make payments on debentures and preferred stock held by the Government once its cumulative net income exceeds $500 million. CBO estimates that if the United States were to retain ownership of Conrail, payments to the Federal Government would begin in 1988. These payments would be slightly less than $300 million in each year, totalling approximatley $800 million between 1988 and 1991.

This debt to the Government will be cancelled under the proposed sale agreement, or the memorandum of intent, as it is called, between the Department of Transportation and Norfolk Southern.

The $400 million loss of tax revenue will result largely from Norfolk Southern's ability to utilize Conrail's tax breaks.

But that is not all.

The memorandum of intent also contains a number of tax warranties which guarantee to Norfolk Southern the manner in which the Internal Revenue Service will handle the sale transaction for tax purposes.

That, in and of itself, makes this a most unusual memorandum of agreement. To provide how the IRS is going to handle a particular transaction is most unusual, if not unique.

The Department of Transportation claims that there is nothing in the memorandum of intent that varies from normal tax procedure. But this is simply not so.

For example: Paragraph 4 of the memorandum states that:

> The cancellation by seller on the date of closing of any interest of seller in any debt, including accrued interest thereon and in preferred stock, including accrued and unpaid dividends thereon of Conrail held by seller shall not result in the recognition of gross income for the purposes of the code.

Simply stated, that mumbo-jumbo means that the $800 million Conrail debt from which Norfolk Southern will be excused will not be recognized as income to Norfolk Southern. Therefore, Norfolk Southern will not have to pay taxes on it.

This is not normal tax procedure.

Suppose the Internal Revenue Service does not buy this argument, and decides that the forgiven debt is, in fact, income, and should be taxed as such.

Well, the memorandum takes care of that problem, too. It indemnifies Norfolk Southern against just such an IRS decision. If the IRS does not go along with the deal, the Department of Transportation will pay Norfolk Southern's tax bill.

> Conrail's net operating loss carryforwards shall not be available for carryover to taxable years beginning on or after the closing.

But there is an exception:

> Except to the extent such carryforwards are attributable solely to reductions required by the Internal Revenue Service in the adjusted tax basis of Conrail's depreciable or amortizable assets as reflected in its U.S. corporation income tax return for the taxable year ending on the closing.

When somebody says that these are not special provisions, it is because they have not seen many other agreements or because they have not read this one, because these are very special provisions.

The sale agreement guarantees to Norfolk Southern the value of Conrail's assets for tax depreciation purposes. However, if the Internal Revenue Service objects to this arrangement, the provision of the memorandum that I just read permits Norfolk Southern to make up the lost tax depreciation benefits by retaining Conrail tax loss carryforwards of a comparable value.

Not bad. In fact, very good, if you are the buyer, but not very good for the U.S. Government.

Here is another unusual warranty.

The IRS may not adjust the tax value basis of Conrail's assets after closing of the sale because, on page 4, paragraph 6(E), subparagraph 2, the memorandum states:

> The adjusted basis at closing of Conrail's and its affiliates' depreciable or amortizable assets shall be as shown on its U.S. corporation income tax return for the taxable year ending on the closing (of the sale), determined without extraordinary departures from the methods of prior years, and said basis as of closing shall not thereafter be increased or decreased as a result of any adjustment to a taxable year of Conrail ending on or before the closing.

I am afraid the American people do not know what we are talking about. But when all is said and done, it winds up to one of the most massive giveaways and specially protected deals that probably the U.S. Government has ever entered into. As a matter of fact, it reminds me of those deals we talked about a couple of years ago, the ship leasing deals, in which the Government guaranteed the tax aspects of the deal and verified the tax application of it. With respect to those deals, Congress has now seen fit to say that we will not look favorably on them and approve them, and this is one we should not.

From the beginning, the value of Conrail's assets for tax depreciation purposes carried over from the old bankrupt railroads. That is normal tax procedure. However, nobody knows whether the carryover basis is actually correct since Conrail has never been audited by the Internal Revenue Service.

By prohibiting the Internal Revenue Service from adjusting the tax value basis of Conrail's assets, the memorandum guarantees that Norfolk Southern will not be harmed by any audit of Conrail's asset that the IRS decides to undertake in the future.

How far we have gone in protecting the buyer and being indifferent to the concerns of the rest of the taxpayers of this country.

The list of special tax warranties goes on, and the sad fact is the Senate Finance Committee never even had a chance to consider them. The bill was not referred to that committee.

At my request, the Senate Judiciary Committee, on which I serve, conducted 2 days of hearings on the sale proposal even though we did not have the bill before us.

The testimony offered during those hearings clearly showed that this is a truly incredible deal for Norfolk Southern.

But it is a raw deal for the taxpayers and for the Northeast-Midwest section of the country.

The price is totally inadequate.

The tax breaks and warranties cannot be justified.

And, there is no indication that the new rail network will provide the level of rail service currently enjoyed by shippers and communities throughout the Northeast and Midwest.

The sale has the marks of a monumental giveaway and I intend to fight it to the end.

But I think we ought to discuss further the misinterpretation and misunderstanding that apparently exists at the White House in connection with this deal.

Mr. President, on January 23, the President of the United States announced in a meeting before a group of business leaders that the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern is a test of congressional will to cut Federal spending.

The President said, and I quote:

> This is a test to see if Congress is serious about meeting the challenge of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, (to) start scaling back the scope and size of Government. If we're to bring down deficit spending, what a better place to start than by trimming away those costly activities like Conrail, which the Government should never have been involved with in the first place.

End of Presidential quote.

I regret to tell my colleagues that the President is seriously misinformed.

The Federal Government has not spent one thin dime on Conrail since 1981.

In fact, in 1981, Conrail earned $39 million.

In 1982 Conrail earned $174 million; in 1983 Conrail earned $313 million; in 1984 it earned $500 million; and in 1985 it earned $440 million.

In other words, Mr. President, Conrail is about the only Government asset that actually makes money.

Yet the President wants us to sell it. Or, more accurately, he wants us to pay Norfolk Southern to take it from us.

What a sweetheart deal for Norfolk Southern this transaction would be.

For $1.2 billion, Norfolk Southern will receive $800 million in cash, they will take control of a pension fund that has a surplus of $250 million and they will be in a position to write off $3.5 million of the capital assets of this railroad.

But, notes the President, the Government will receive $1.2 billion in cash.

Oh, what a deal that is for the Federal Government.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, the Government will lose that entire $1.2 billion between 1986 and 1990 because of Norfolk Southern's ability to depreciate Conrail's assets, and because the Government will forego interest and dividend payments that a federally owned Conrail would pay the Government beginning in 1988.

Mr. President, that last sentence is so important to what we are talking about that I am going to take the liberty of repeating it exactly as I read it the first time, because it is the critical issue on this entire subject.

I quote:

> According to the Congressional Budget Office, the Government will lose that entire $1.2 billion between 1986 and 1990 because of Norfolk Southern's ability to depreciate Conrail's assets and because the Government will forego interest and dividend payments that a federally owned Conrail would pay the Government beginning in 1988.

In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, on April 2, 1985, Treasury Department officials promised to provide the committee the Department's analysis of the tax implications of the Conrail sale. After 10 full months of delay, from April 2, 1985, after the bill was already pending before the Senate, the Department finally saw fit to provide us their report.

What does their analysis say?

It says that selling Conrail to Norfolk Southern will cost the Government $174 million in lost tax revenues between 1986 to 1990.

I believe that these figures are conservative at best. But even assuming that they are correct, the figures are just another reason why we should not enact this legislation.

In each year starting with 1986, this transaction will reduce the amount of revenues collected by the Federal Treasury.

The President's own Department of the Treasury admits that this sale is a revenue loser.

And, therefore, this bill violates section 311 of the Budget Act as amended by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. It is, in other words, a budget buster.

How absurd. How unbelievable. The only asset that this Government has that makes money, that reduces the Federal budget deficit, and what are we asked to do?

We are asked to pay someone to take it off our hands.

We are asked to bust the budget.

We are asked to violate Gramm-Rudman-Hollings as the first order of business before this session of Congress.

I believe the President of the United States ought to consider the views of his own Treasury Department before he announces that selling Conrail to Norfolk Southern is consistent with "meeting the challenge of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings," and balancing the Federal budget.

The fact is, it is not consistent with the Gramm-Rudman effort. This proposed sale is a blatant giveaway of valuable Government assets and it will create one of the largest tax shelters in history.

This issue before us, this Conrail bill, is the acid test for Gramm-Rudman. If we pass this bill, if we give away $174 million in revenues, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is dead.

Therefore, Mr. President, I raise a point of order that the bill violates section 303 of the Budget Act as amended by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, pursuant to section 904 of the Congressional Budget Act, I move to waive section 303 of that act for the consideration of S. 638 and any amendment thereto.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, this is a debatable motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCONNELL). The motion made by the Senator from Missouri is debatable.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is debatable.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, we now have the Senator from Missouri making the motion, which he is entitled to make, to waive the Budget Act. But the issue is simple. The issue is whether or not the U.S. Senate, in its first major act with respect to legislation, is going to waive the budgetary constrictions that we ourselves have enacted into law. Are we going to stand here and say that Conrail is so important that we do not worry about Gramm-Rudman-Hollings; we do not worry about the Budget Act; we are only concerned about Conrail, and the first thing we are going to do of any real importance this year is to waive those budgetary constraints?

I say to my colleagues: Are you prepared to go back home, wherever that home is, and say you have been making speeches about balancing the budget and, at the very same time, the first thing you are going to do, the first important vote is going to be waive, waive the budget? Do that, my colleagues, and you will make a farce out of the entire budgetary process. You will say that we have made the speeches but, when push comes shove, we are prepared to waive it.

Now, it does not matter that it is Conrail or anything else. It indicates that there is no lack of resolve, if you accept and approve the motion of the Senator from Missouri to waive the budgetary restrictions.

What possible difference does it mean to have these restraints? What kind of hypocrisy will it be if we decide that the very first thing we do in the U.S. Senate of any consequence is to waive Gramm-Rudman-Hollings? I think that is something that every Member of this body has to think about. It does not matter whether you are for Conrail or against Conrail. It does not matter what your political philosophy is.

I voted against Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. I did not think it made any sense.

I see the distinguished leader of the Senate coming on the floor and I point out to him that the issue is a simple one: Is the first act that the U.S. Senate is going to perform going to be to waive the provisions of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings? You will make it an editorial field day across the country. The columnists and the cartoonists and the editorial writers are going to say that the Senate indicated its strong resolve when they took a bill such as the Conrail bill, where we have $200 million more that will be available if we sold it to somebody else, and there is probably a lot more available if we would just go to secret bidding—the real question is: What is this body up to; why would we possibly want to waive the provisions of the Gramm-Rudman bill?

Now there is no secret about the fact that the reason that the motion was made is because the Senator from Ohio raised the point of order that it was in violation of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings; it was in violation of section 303.

I will pose a parliamentary inquiry to the Parliamentarian or the Chair. Is it not the fact that, had there not been a motion to waive the rule, the Senator from Ohio's point of order would have been well taken?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Since the bill affects revenues in a fiscal year for which there is no concurrent resolution on the budget, the bill would violate section 303 of the Budget Act.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Chair. The bill would violate section 303 of the Budget Act. And so we have a motion to waive the rule, waive the rule so we can go ahead and violate section 303 of the Budget Act.

How many of my colleagues who fought so hard—and there were many of you—who fought so hard to enact the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill are going to be able to walk off the floor, if you support the motion of the Senator from Missouri, and say, proudly, "The first thing I did in the U.S. Senate this year of any real consequence was to violate section 303 of the Budget Act," parenthetically, called the provisions of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act? I do not think that this body is prepared to take that action.

I cannot believe that there are 51 Members of this body who are going to vote in the affirmative to waive the provisions of the very law that we just spent almost an entire year seeing to it that it became the law and the President of the United States has indicated his approval by signing it into law.

Mr. President, I have indicated to my distinguished colleague from Missouri that I think it would be unfair, both from his standpoint and my standpoint, and in fairness to our colleagues who have been assured there would not be a vote on this matter today, so I inquire of him as to whether or not he would agree to a unanimous consent request that, when we return tomorrow, when we get back on the bill at 2 o'clock, there be 2 hours of debate, evenly divided, with respect to this motion and that there be a vote in connection with his motion at 4 o'clock and that the yeas and nays would be ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I have discussed this matter with the majority leader. He has suggested 3 o'clock. He believes that, in view of the fact that it is possible that a motion to recommit will be made, several amendments will be offered and there will be rollcalls and he is anxious to get the bill moving forward, he suggested perhaps we vote at 3 o'clock. That would be suitable for me. I would suggest that, if we come in at 2, an hour, equally divided, would perhaps give us an opportunity to air the issue.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I am not prepared to make an issue of whether it is 3 o'clock or 4 o'clock. I do understand we have been requested on this side of the aisle to run a hotline to see whether or not there is any problem. I, therefore, suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. DANFORTH. Will the Senator withhold?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes, of course.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I have two parliamentary inquiries to put to the Chair. First, the Senator from Ohio refers to section 303 of the Budget Act as modified by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings provision. Does Gramm-Rudman-Hollings modify section 303 of the Budget Act?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 303 of the Budget Act is not modified by the legislation referred to as Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

Mr. DANFORTH. I thank the Chair.

Second, Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri last Friday offered a substitute for S. 638. Earlier today, before the Senator from Ohio made his point of order, I stated that it was my intention to ask unanimous consent that the substitute be agreed to and treated as original text.

Mr. President, let me ask first of all: Is the point of order of the Senator from Ohio made against the underlying bill, or is it made against the substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order was made against the underlying bill.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the Chair has stated that the point of order would be well taken against the underlying bill. But I ask the Chair: Would the point of order be well taken against the substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In response to that question, the Chair would like to clarify an earlier response to an earlier inquiry. It is the understanding of the Chair that the point of order was made on grounds that the underlying bill affects revenues. Section 303 of the Budget Act was affected by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings to apply to credit, and the Chair wishes to correct his response to the Senator from Missouri in that respect.

As to revenues, the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri would not affect revenues in fiscal 1987, and, therefore, would not be subject to a point of order under section 303.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, let me clarify for the Senate what the position is as I understand it that is taken by the Senator from Ohio.

The bill itself—the underlying bill, S. 638—is a complex piece of legislation, and provides among other things some tax provisions; that is to say, the bill incorporates within it the basic agreement between Norfolk Southern and the Department of Transportation. That basic agreement included a forgoing by Norfolk Southern of various tax advantages that it would otherwise have, including the net operating loss carryover, and the investment tax credit carryover. Those provisions in the agreement were embodied in the bill itself. And I believe there were several other—I think it would be fair to say—minor provisions of tax law that were incorporated into the bill.

Therefore, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is quite correct as a technical matter: S. 638 not only would violate section 303 of the Budget Act, but it would in fact violate the Constitution because it is a Senate bill. And it includes within it certain tax provisions. But, Mr. President, it is the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri that the underlying S. 638 should no longer be before the Senate.

What we have done, among other things, in the substitute is to provide that no tax provisions, however technical, shall take effect in this legislation until the House bill is passed. Therefore, as the Chair has clearly stated, the point of order that has been raised by the Senator from Ohio would not lie against S. 638 as it would appear if the substitute were agreed to.

Mr. President, the basic question that is raised by the Senator from Ohio when we get beyond the technical fine points—and I think that he is really insisting on technical fine points here—is the question of budget consequences. My view is exactly the opposite of the Senator from Ohio. My view is, from the standpoint of budgetary consideration, the arguments are all for the sale. The Senator from Ohio in making his argument does not argue for the Morgan Stanley sale. He does not argue for some alternative form of selling the railroad. He says:

> Let us keep it. Let us keep the railroad. Let us renege on the decision of the Congress in 1981. Let us renege on the agreement by the Department of Transportation. Let us forget about the whole thing. We have climbed this mountain now for 6 years. Let us climb right back down again, and not have any sale at all.

Now, he claims by not having any sale at all somehow that would have positive budgetary consequences. I do not see why. Mr. President, we did not do much last year. We did not do much in solving the problem of the deficit in the Federal budget, but one of the things we agreed to—I thought when we passed the budget resolution itself—was we were going to sell Conrail, and pick up $1.2 billion in proceeds from that sale. Those are the proceeds that would be coming in. They would be scored accordingly pursuant to the budget resolution which we passed last year.

Now the Senator from Ohio says, oh, forget about the $1.2 billion that we agreed to. Well, if we forget about it, Mr. President, where are we going to go? Where are we going to get it? We are going to be fighting the battle of the budget all year. The majority leader can hardly wait to get this bill off the floor so we can go on with other work that we have to do in the Senate. We are going to be tied into knots by the budget. If we give up $1.2 billion in proceeds, where is that money going to come from? Defense, discretionary appropriations? That is just a question of proceeds.

I do not think that the ownership of Conrail by the Federal Government has been any great financial boon to Uncle Sam. In fact, between 1977 and 1984, the Federal Government spent $3.4 billion in subsidies for Conrail's operations and capital investments, and in addition to that, Uncle Sam paid out a little over $600 million to Conrail employees whose jobs were eliminated.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio wants to argue the technicalities of whether there are tax provisions in the underlying bill, I concede that he is right. He is right. Let us correct that. That is what I suggest. Let us correct that. Let us adopt the substitute. We can solve that problem. We can solve it. The Parliamentarian tells us we can solve it, the Chair tells us, simply by adopting the substitute which does not make any substantive changes in the bill. It is merely a technical substitute. We can solve that problem if he is making a technical point, and if he is making a debater's point.

But if he is making the point the overall health of the Federal Treasury, if he is making the argument about the whole point of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, then, Mr. President, the worst thing we can do is to do nothing. The worst thing we can do is to retain ownership of Conrail.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I rise today to offer an amendment to ensure competition between the proposed Norfolk Southern/Conrail Railroad and the many smaller railroads which could be jeopardized by such a merger. I will explain why this amendment is needed, its purpose, how it will work, and the rationale behind each of its specific substantive provisions.

WHY THE AMENDMENT IS NEEDED

To state it very simply, this amendment is needed to protect small and regional railroads from being driven out of business as a result of Norfolk Southern's monopoly-like market position. Norfolk Southern would have the ability to devastate smaller railroads through traffic diversions. Let me explain:

Norfolk Southern and the Department of Transportation have argued before our Commerce Committee that: First, any diversion of traffic from small and regional carriers as a result of this merger would be slight; and second, the traffic that is diverted would be diverted as a result of increased efficiencies realized by the merger rather than because of the exercise of market power. They maintain that there will still be strong, effective competition for transcontinental traffic. But it is my fear that the essential element of effective competition will be absent in S. 638. This is so because Norfolk Southern will have a monopoly in the Eastern part of the United States.

Because of its monopoly position in the East, Norfolk Southern will be able to divert transcontinental traffic from its present route to one which goes through a greater percentage of Norfolk Southern track, thereby assuring it a bigger percentage of the joint rate. This could be done even though a more direct and efficient route is available because Norfolk Southern will be able to dictate the route through which this transcontinental traffic will enter its territory. It cannot do that today because it competes with Conrail for the traffic within its territory. After the merger, it will control all effective access to the Eastern markets. There is no evidence that Guilford or anyone else will be able to provide the kind of competition to prevent this from happening.

If the essential element of effective competition is absent in S. 638, the amendment I am introducing will be critical to the very existence of many smaller railroads within and outside the Norfolk Southern/Conrail region. If I am wrong and the competitive element is there, this amendment can never go into effect. The amendment specifically provides that the diversions must result from the exercise of market power by Norfolk Southern before it can be utilized.

Indeed, if the Department of Transportation is correct in its estimates, the amendment can never be used outside the NS/CR region. So I sincerely hope that the Department will support its passage. Last Friday, I sent a letter to the Secretary of Transportation asking for the Department's support. I shall have the entire text of that letter printed in the RECORD following my remarks, but would like to quote from relevant parts of it here:

> Enclosed for your consideration is a copy of an amendment I will be offering to S. 638, the Conrail Sale Amendments Act. The purpose of this letter is to seek your support for its successful passage in the Senate.
> As you know, my major concern with S. 638 is the potential adverse impact that a merged Norfolk Southern/Conrail Railroad System would have on the railroads in the midwest and other parts of the country outside the immediate Norfolk Southern/Conrail region. Since the Department of Transportation has estimated that no railroad outside this area will suffer traffic diversions in excess of 2 percent of present traffic, it is my hope that you will be able to support the amendment.
> We have chosen the three and one-half percent diversion figure because it represents the point at which the actual existence of some of these smaller railroads is threatened. I trust you will find this percentage figure to be extremely conservative as it would require diversions in excess of 200 percent of the department's "most liberal case" estimates before it could be used by railroads outside the NS/CR region.

If for any reason you find the three and one-half percent figure to be out of line with the department's estimate, I would be happy to substitute it with the actual percentage figures contained in the department's June 28, 1985, letter to Chairman Danforth of the Senate Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee.

THE AMENDMENT'S PURPOSE

The purpose of the amendment is quite simple. It is to protect small and regional railroads from unfair market power and other anticompetitive pressures which could be exerted by a combined NS/CR railroad. The rail system of the West and Midwest, as well as the smaller Northeastern carriers, should not be sacrificed for the sole benefit of a single railroad.

The return of Conrail to the private sector represents the last chapter in the Federal Government's rescue of the Northeast rail system after the Penn Central and six other railroads collapsed in 1970. This amendment is designed to ensure that it is not the first chapter in the collapse of the rail system in the Midwest or other parts of the country. It would be ironic indeed if, by finally turning this system over to the private sector and getting the Federal Government out of the railroad business, we set the wheels in motion for larger railroad failures in other parts of the country, thereby starting the process all over again.

This amendment is the result of a sincere desire to avoid a potentially catastrophic situation with railroads in other parts of the country. It is not intended to be, and certainly should not be, a killer amendment of any kind.

HOW THE AMENDMENT WILL WORK

Mr. President, this is a relatively brief, straightforward, and simple amendment. It is approximately three pages in length and the substantive provisions are as follows:

First, the amendment permits smaller railroads to petition the ICC to seek relief from diversions of traffic from their lines that are attributable to the acquisition of Conrail by Norfolk Southern. The conditions precedent to seeking relief are: First, that the petition be filed within 10 years of the consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern; second, that in calendar 1985 the petitioning railroad have had rail operating revenues less than $1 billion; and third, that the petitioning railroad allege the diversions result from the acquisition of Conrail by Norfolk Southern and the exercise of market power by the consolidated Norfolk Southern and Conrail system—the consolidated system.

Second, the ICC will not be required to proceed with the petitioning railroad's claim unless it finds that the petitioning railroad, as a result of the exercise of market power by the consolidated system, has suffered either: First, a diversion of traffic equal to or greater than 3½ percent of the number of carloads handled by the railroad in calendar 1985, or second, a rerouting of traffic that has resulted in a loss of revenues from such traffic equal to or greater than 3½ percent of the rail operating revenues of the petitioning railroad in calendar 1985.

Third, if the ICC finds that the traffic diversion have occurred as a result of the exercise of market power, they will then determine the divestitures or conditions necessary to eliminate the market power of the consolidated system, and to provide the petitioning railroad fully competitive connecting access to each major rail market.

Fourth, the amendment requires that any divestiture required shall be made at prices to be agreed by the Norfolk Southern and the divestee. In the event that the parties cannot agree on a price, the Commission is directed to set a price for the divested properties. In setting a price the Commission is directed not to take into account any value of the divested properties that results from the market power of the consolidated system in any rail market.

And finally, the amendment requires that a final decision be made within 1 year of the date of filing the petition, and that the ICC follow the normal Administrative Procedure Act and Interstate Commerce Act guidelines.

Mr. President, I have prepared a full section-by-section analysis which I shall submit for the RECORD in its entirety.

RATIONALE BEHIND CERTAIN PROVISIONS

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to explain the rationale behind some of the provisions of this amendment that I expect will be questioned by those who support Norfolk Southern's desire to have a clean bill with no amendments.

First and foremost, I want to make it very clear that this is not an attempt to reregulate the industry in any way. I think that this is clear enough on its face, but I want to emphasize this point. Indeed, many of the strongest advocates of deregulation support this amendment.

This does not confer any unusual authority on the ICC. In fact, merger proposals normally are required to be approved by the ICC unless they have a special statutory exemption, as is the case here. When the ICC does approve a merger under the normal procedures, it frequently retains jurisdiction to modify conditions or to impose new conditions on the merged railroad if it utilizes its monopolistic position to the competitive detriment of other affected railroads. This amendment is modeled after that frequent ICC practice and is not giving the ICC any unusual authority. In fact, it is simply restoring a small portion of what normally would have been within its power, if Congress had not granted an exemption.

Second, the amendment requires Norfolk Southern to show that the diversions resulted "because of superior service and efficiency," rather than because of its market power. This burden of proof is placed on Norfolk Southern for two very good reasons.

Most importantly, Norfolk Southern will be the only railroad with the information and data necessary to prove the reasons for the diversions. To place the burden on the petitioning railroad would be to require them to prove a negative. That is almost impossible in any case. Norfolk Southern is clearly in the best position to prove what caused the diversions and the amendment reflects that reality. The second reason is that Norfolk Southern has consistently stated that no diversions will result from the merger. I feel it is only fair that they be required to prove their point.

CONCLUSION

With that, Mr. President, I conclude my remarks on this amendment. I urge my colleagues to support it when it is offered tomorrow or later in the debate on S. 638. It should not present a problem to Norfolk Southern, the Department of Transportation, or the proponents of S. 638 if the information the Department has been supplying us is correct. And it will insure against a potentially catastrophic situation that could be caused in other parts of the country as a result of S. 638 without this important amendment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that first, a copy of the amendment, second, a section-by-section analysis of the amendment, third, a copy of the January 24 letter I sent to the Secretary of Transportation regarding the amendment, and fourth, a copy of the "Dear Colleague" signed by the eight cosponsors of this amendment be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The text of the amendment (No. 1438) is printed under Routine Morning Business.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH A PROCEEDING BY THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Subsection 303(a). This subsection of the amendment permits smaller railroads to petition the ICC to seek relief from diversions of traffic from their lines that are attributable to the acquisition of Conrail by Norfolk Southern. The conditions precedent to seeking relief are (1) that the petition be filed within 10 years of the consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern; (2) that in calendar 1985 the petitioning railroad have had rail operating revenues less than $1 billion; and (3) that the petitioning railroad allege the diversions result from the acquisition of Conrail by Norfolk Southern and the exercise of market power by the consolidated Norfolk Southern and Conrail system (the Consolidated System.)

Subsection 303(b). This subsection requires the Commission to commence a proceeding in response to a petition filed under subsection 303(a) if it finds that the petitioning railroad, as a result of the exercise of market power by the Consolidated System, has suffered either: (1) a diversion of traffic equal to or greater than 3½ percent of the number of carloads handled by the railroad in calendar 1985, or (2) a rerouting of traffic that has resulted in a loss of revenues from such traffic equal to or greater than 3½ percent of the rail operating revenues of the petitioning railroad in calendar 1985.

In determining whether the diversion or rerouting of traffic was caused by the exercise of market power by the Consolidated System, Norfolk Southern will have the burden of establishing by clear and convincing evidence that the diversion or rerouting was caused by superior service and efficiency on the route to which the traffic was diverted. In the absence of such proof by Norfolk Southern, the Commission is required to presume that the diversions were caused by the exercise of market power by the Consolidated System.

Subsection 303(c). This subsection requires the Commission, in a proceeding commenced under subsection 303(b), to determine the additional divestitures or conditions necessary to eliminate the market power of the Consolidated System, and to provide the petitioning railroad fully competitive connecting access to each major rail market.

In determining whether the Consolidated System has market power in any major rail market, the Commission is directed to accord substantial weight to the methods of analysis of market power set forth in the merger guidelines issued by the Department of Justice.

At the conclusion of such a proceeding, the Commission is required to issue an order directing divestitures and conditions to eliminate the market power of the Consolidated System in those major rail markets where it has such power, and to provide the petitioning railroad with competitive alternative access to the major rail markets served by the Consolidated System.

Subsection 303(d). This subsection requires that the divestitures ordered by the Commission under this Section shall be made at prices to be agreed by the Norfolk Southern and the divestee approved by the Commission. In the event that the parties cannot agree on a price, the Commission is directed to set a price for the divested properties. In setting a price the Commission is directed not to take into account any value of the divested properties that results from the market power of the Consolidated System in any rail market.

Subsection 303(e). This subsection requires that the Commission issue a final order in a proceeding initiated in response to a petition filed under subsection 303(a) within one year of the date of filing of the petition.

Subsection 303(f). This subsection ensures that the decision and order of the Commission issued in a proceeding under this Section be subject to judicial review in the same manner as other Commission orders in merger proceedings—in the United States Court of Appeal under the provisions of the Hobbs Act and in accordance with the standards of the Administrative Procedure Act. The subsection also provides that any divestiture or condition ordered by the Commission under this Section be deemed approved by the Commission under Chapter 113 of the Interstate Commerce Act. This approval ensures that the divestitures and conditions ordered by the Commission may be implemented with immunity from antitrust liability and notwithstanding the contrary provisions of any state or federal law.

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, SCIENCE, AND TRANSPORTATION,
Washington, DC, January 24, 1986.

Hon. ELIZABETH DOLE,
Secretary, Department of Transportation, Washington, DC.

DEAR MADAME SECRETARY: Enclosed for your consideration is a copy of an amendment I will be offering to S. 638, the Conrail Sale Amendments Act. The purpose of this letter is to seek your support for its successful passage in the Senate.

As you know, my major concern with S. 638 is the potential adverse impact that a merged Norfolk Southern/Conrail railroad system would have on the railroads in the Midwest and other parts of the country outside the immediate Norfolk Southern/Conrail region. Since the Department of Transportation has estimated that no railroad outside this area will suffer traffic diversions in excess of 2 percent of present traffic, it is my hope that you will be able to support the amendment.

As I have described in recent Senate speeches, this amendment is designed to protect smaller railroads in the Midwest and the West from the potentially anticompetitive impacts of the merger. It would not go into effect unless the ICC finds that, as a result of the anticompetitive impact of the merger, these smaller railroads have experienced traffic diversions in excess of three and one-half percent. If the Department's estimates are accurate, the amendment should never have to be used by these railroads and I hope you can support it.

We have chosen the three and one-half percent diversion figure because it represents the point at which the actual existence of some of these smaller railroads is threatened. I trust you will find this percentage figure to be extremely conservative as it would require diversions in excess of 200 percent of the Department's "most liberal case" estimates before it could be used by railroads outside the NS/CR region.

If for any reason you find the three and one-half percent figure to be out of line with the Department's estimate, I would be happy to substitute it with the actual percentage figures contained in the Department's June 28, 1985, letter to Chairman Danforth of the Senate Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee. That letter contained the following traffic diversion estimates for Midwestern carriers:

	Percent
Katy	0

Another letter from the Department addressed to me dated August 2, 1985, stated that "[t]he diversion figures for the Midwestern carriers are all below the two percent figure, both in the base case and the liberal case estimates," and that the "[i]mpact on the Western carriers is de minimus, both in absolute and percentage terms."

I have relied on these letters, along with the Department's testimony at Commerce Committee hearings, in drafting this important amendment. It is a good faith effort on my part to soften what I fear will be a serious anticompetitive problem for railroads around the country. I still believe that a stand-alone Conrail would address the problem far more efficiently. However, absent the stand-alone alternative, I believe this amendment will go a long way in addressing my concerns.

I would appreciate it if you could advise me as to your position on this amendment as soon as practicable. If you should have any questions or would like to discuss this issue in more detail, please feel free to call me or have your staff contact Kevin Schieffer of my office. Any suggestions would be appreciated. I appreciate your consideration of this matter and look forward to working with you.

Sincerely,

LARRY PRESSLER,
U.S. Senator.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, January 21, 1986.

Re Conrail Sale Amendments Act (S. 638).

DEAR COLLEAGUE: When the Senate considers the Conrail Sale Amendments Act (S. 638) this week, we will offer an amendment which is designed to protect small and regional railroads from unfair market dominance and other anticompetitive pressures which could be exerted by a combined Norfolk Southern/Conrail (NS/CR). The amendment would apply only to the extent that the ICC finds anticompetitive or unfair market control has been exercised by NS/CR.

Although the amendment is designed to protect smaller railroads in the Midwest and the West, it also applies to small railroads within the immediate NS/CR region. It does not apply to the larger railroads such as CSX, Burlington Northern, Union Pacific, etc.

In effect, the amendment simply gives the affected railroads a cause of action before the Interstate Commerce Commission if within ten years of the consummation of the sale the ICC finds that these small or regional railroads have experienced traffic diversions of three and one-half percent or greater, due to the anticompetitive impact of the sale. If the diversions are caused by fair competiton or some other nonmonopolistic force, no remedy will be available. The remedy under the plan would be to allow the affected railroad, following an ICC investigation and determination, to purchase at fair market value enough track or trackage rights from NS/CR to allow for adequate competition in the affected region.

The philosophy behind this amendment is quite simple: the rail system of the Midwest or the Western part of the country, as well as the smaller Northeastern carriers, should not be sacrificed for the the sole benefit of a single railroad.

We do not believe this transaction should be made at the expense of other railroads. But, if Department of Transportation figures are accurate, this amendment should never have to be used. The DOT estimates that "[t]he diversion figures for the Midwestern carriers are all below the two percent figure, both in the base case and the liberal case estimates," and that the "[i]mpact on the Western carriers is de minimus, both in absolute and percentage terms." So this amendment should not pose a problem assuming these estimates are accurate. Indeed, we have made the numbers extremely conservative. The amendment would require diversions in excess of 200 percent of the DOT's "most liberal case" estimates before it could be used by railroads outside the immediate NS/CR region!

We have used the three and one-half percent diversion figure because it represents the point at which the actual existence of some of the smaller railroads is threatened. Additionally, we have made it very clear that the diversions must be caused by anticompetitive factors arising from the NS/CR merger. Diversions for other reasons simply will not be considered by the ICC.

This amendment is the result of a sincere desire on our part to avoid a potentially catastrophic situation with railroads in other parts of the country. Conrail originally became the ward of the federal government because of the large number of railroad failures in the Northeast. It would indeed be ironic if, by finally turning this system over to the private sector and getting the federal government out of the railroad business, we set the wheels in motion for larger railroad failures in other parts of the country, thereby starting the process all over again.

Our amendment will provide for protection against that happening. It would not require any re-regulation of the industry. (Indeed, it may never have to go into effect.) Regardless of how you ultimately decide to vote on the merits of S. 638, we hope you will be able to support this amendment as a reasonable means of protecting railroads outside the NS/CR region from the potentially anticompetitive impacts of this transaction.

We ask for your support for this extremely important amendment, and invite you to join us as a cosponsor.

If you have any questions regarding this amendment or if you would like to cosponsor, please contact us or have our staff contact Kevin Schieffer of Senator Pressler's office at Ext. 45842 or Bill Mattea of Senator Dixon's office at Ext. 48814.

Sincerely,

Alan J. Dixon, Larry Pressler, John Heinz, Paul Simon, Russell Long, James Abdnor, Edward Zorinsky, James Exon.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I do not think we want to confuse the issue. Let me see if I can throw a little light on it.

The Parliamentarian has stated that the point of order the Senator from Ohio has made would have been sustained but for the fact that the Senator from Missouri made his motion to waive the Budget Act provisions. The Parliamentarian has also made it clear that section 303 of the Budget Act says that no revenue can be lost in fiscal year 1987 prior to the adoption of the first concurrent budget resolution for this year and that Gramm-Rudman made a number of modifications to this section, such as expanding it to include a later budget, but that the facts are that section 303 of Budget Act is in place and would provide the basis for sustaining the point of order of the Senator from Ohio.

If I have misstated the facts or the law, then I hope that the Parliamentarian will be good enough, through the Chair, to advise the Senator from Ohio if he has misstated it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct in his statement.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Chair.

What we were talking about is the point that the Senator from Ohio has made. That is that we are going to lose revenue—we are going to lose revenue—if we adopt the pending bill. I shall address myself momentarily to the substitute, but first, I want to point out the situation with respect to the pending bill, because the substitute is not yet in place.

The Congressional Budget Office, on June 6, 1985, wrote as follows to my colleague from Missouri:

If this bill is enacted, we estimate that the Federal Government would be paid about $1.4 billion in 1986 for the sale of Conrail, would save about $10 million a year in labor protection payments, and would lose about $0.4 billion in tax revenues and $0.8 billion in future interest and dividend payments from Conrail over the 1986-90 period.

So, instead, there would be a loss of revenue.

As a matter of fact, my colleague from Missouri is aware of the fact that this body has no authority to deal with revenue producing measures and the Conrail bill is such a measure as would be barred from our acting in connection with it under the Constitution of the United States because the Constitution of the United States provides that revenue measures must originate in the House of Representatives. So, what do we have before us today?

My colleague from Missouri is asking unanimous consent to substitute a totally different bill than that which came out of committee and that bill contains a provision that is unique. It is understandably unique because it has not been proposed at an earlier time because it will not fly. It is not in accord with the Constitution. You cannot make a rose out of a sow's ear and you cannot make a revenue producer into a nonrevenue producer in the manner in which the effort has been made in the substitute bill which my colleague is asking us to take up by unanimous consent or put in place by unanimous consent. They have inserted the following provision in the substitute:

Any provision of this act which, pursuant to article I, section 7, of the Constitution, provides for raising revenue shall only be effective upon the enactment into law of a bill which has originated in the House of Representatives enacting such provision.

If any Member of the U.S. Senate thinks that our distinguished colleagues in the House of Representatives are going to give up in one fell swoop their prerogatives in originating revenue measures, he is kidding himself or she is kidding herself.

The House of Representatives is not going to accept a bill to circumvent the restraints in the Constitution of the United States. As a matter of fact, I think that there is a kind of impudence, and I do not mean the word in a derogatory sense, but there is a kind of impudence or impertinence in our sending that kind of measure over to them and thinking that they are going to accept it. I have had some exploratory talks with some Members of the House—with many of them; I cannot speak to all of them at once since there are 435—to inquire of them as to their reaction to this very unique and unusual provision. Before the afternoon has concluded or at some point tomorrow, I shall address myself further to that subject after having heard from one or more Members of the House.

Suffice it to say that we stand here this afternoon being asked to waive—to waive—Gramm-Rudman-Hollings as it affects section 303 or, vice versa, section 303 as amended by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. But slice it any way you want, we are being asked to waive Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

The first act of any meaningful consequence by the U.S. Senate in the year 1986, and what would it do? It would open the door for another waiver and another waiver and another waiver and another waiver, down the line, from Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

If my colleagues feel as strongly as I do about our obligation to balance the budget—and some may hope to do it through Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, and others of us think it should be done by an up or down vote, but no one can deny our obligation to attempt to balance the budget. If that be the case, we have a responsibility from which we should not shrink. That is, we should not agree to waive the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings provisions as they affect section 303.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio says slice it any way you want. I do not want to slice it the way the Senator from Ohio sliced it, whatever "it" is.

Mr. President, the fact is that the Senator from Ohio has made a very technical point of order going against the underlying bill, not pertaining in any way to the substitute and not touching in any way Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. The Senator from Ohio says that the issue before the Senate is whether, the first thing out of the box, we are going to waive Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. Mr. President, I have not asked that the Senate waive Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. I support Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. I voted for Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. I believe that it is a step toward getting control of the Federal deficit. I believe that selling Conrail is a step toward getting control of the Federal deficit in two ways: One, bringing revenue in through the sale and, two, stopping the hemorrhage of subsidies which has flowed out of the Treasury in order to keep Conrail going.

Mr. President, to further clarify my understanding that the point of order raised by the Senator from Ohio does not have anything to do with Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, I would put the following question to the Chair. Mr. President, I would like to reiterate my understanding of the point of order raised by the Senator from Ohio. The Senator raised a point of order under section 303 of the Budget Act that the underlying bill would affect revenue. Am I correct in my understanding that the Gramm-Rudman bill did not make any material change in the revenue provisions of section 303?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. DANFORTH. And therefore, Mr. President—I will not direct this question to the Chair but just say it as a point of analysis—when the Senator from Ohio attempts to link his point of order with Gramm-Rudman, his point of order has nothing whatever to do with Gramm-Rudman—nothing. It is totally an extraneous argument. It is an effort by the Senator from Ohio to try to shoehorn the question of the Federal budget into an infinitesimally small procedural point directed not against the substitute but against the underlying bill.

Mr. President, I suggest that we could agree not to waive the Budget Act, we could go along with the point made by the Senator from Ohio. Maybe the most straightforward way, however, for Senators to say the same thing is to vote against the bill when we get to it, the bill as modified, the bill as altered by the substitute. That would be the most straightforward way to oppose the sale, but this point of order has nothing to do with Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

Mr. President, I really appreciate what I would call the hypersensitivity of the Senator from Ohio to Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. I did not quite get that same concern for it last fall when the Senate was addressing the question of Gramm-Rudman, but on the authority that politics makes strange bedfellows I am glad we are in the same bed under Gramm-Rudman.

Mr. METZENBAUM. If the Senator will yield for a moment so he can yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania——

Mr. DANFORTH. I will yield the floor.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. It is indeed the fact that I was very sensitive to Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, so sensitive that I voted against it. And if I had the privilege to do it again, I would vote against it. I am inclined to think there are a number of Senators in this body who, given the opportunity to do so, might very well like to vote against it as I did. I think many have second thoughts about it. But the Senator from Ohio believes that, regardless of how I voted, it is now the law, and if it is the law I think we ought to live up to the law. I believe that we will be violating section 311 of the Budget Act as amended by Gramm-Rudman.

It is true that Gramm-Rudman did not affect the revenue aspects of it but did affect 311 in other respects. So the whole issue is simple. It does not matter whether it is 311, it does not matter whether it is part of the Budget Act, whether it is Gramm-Rudman. The fact is the Senator put in the RECORD a letter from Treasury indicating that this bill will cost $174 million. CBO has even larger figures, substantially larger figures as to the cost. You do not have to be a great mathematician to understand if you are not going to get $300,000 a year between 1987, 1988 and 1989 repaid, that is a loss. You do not have to be a great mathematician to understand someone has the right to depreciate $3.5 billion in capital assets, which Norfolk-Southern would have and take that depreciation away from its other profits. You do not have to be a mathematician to know that this company is making $440 million a year and that the buyer is going to get $800 million in cash and $250 million in pension funds.

All of those things are self-evident. The fact is this bill will cost this revenue. And so my sole point in making the point of order is not to be technical but to be realistic and say to my colleagues in the Senate you wanted to balance the budget, and the first thing you are going to vote for on the floor is a measure that would waive constraints of the Budget Act.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for a question, I think the Senator misquoted himself but I am not sure. My understanding was that the point of order went to section 303 of the Budget Act. The Senator just stated that he intended to raise the question of section 311 of the Budget Act.

Mr. METZENBAUM. The Senator from Missouri is correct. My point of order was to 303, not to 311.

Mr. DANFORTH. The Senator's reasoning, as I understand it, is that there is, despite the reply of the Chair to my parliamentary inquiry, some language which is relevant to the argument before us between section 303 and Gramm-Rudman?

Mr. METZENBAUM. That is correct.

Mr. SPECTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRESSLER). The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, when the distinguished manager of the bill, the Senator from Missouri, makes the statement that politics make strange bedfellows, it is obviously a truism of American politics and has been true in this body for many years. But this Senator believes there is a way to rearrange the sleeping accomodations to take care of the underlying thrust that the distinguished manager of the bill, the Senator from Missouri, wants to accomplish, and to accomplish the objections raised by the distinguished Senator from Ohio as well.

When the Senator from Missouri says that the most straightforward way to deal with the objection raised by the distinguished Senator from Ohio may be to vote against the bill, I suggest that there is a better approach. That approach would accommodate the interest of the Senator from Missouri along with the interest of the administration in selling Conrail, in privatizing Conrail, and to do so in a way which would not violate the Budget Act.

My obvious reference here is to have a sale to the investment group gathered by Morgan Stanley, which has offered $1.4 billion—$200 million in excess of the amount offered by Norfolk Southern, and an amount plainly sufficient to meet the requirements of the Budget Act.

The letter from the Treasury Department which specified that the Norfolk Southern proposal would cost the Government, I believe, $124 million, inserted a figure showing that there would be a net gain to the Treasury by the offer of Morgan Stanley. I believe that figure was $24 million.

So I think there is no question about the fact that the Morgan Stanley offer would comply with the requirements of the Budget Act.

I compliment the distinguished Senator from Missouri on his very assiduous work on this Conrail issue. As chairman of the Commerce Committee, he has presided over lengthy hearings. He has worked very hard on this issue. It is a complicated issue, While I do not know the details of his schedule, I am sure he has conferred on many occasions with many administrative officials, and many of his colleagues, and has spearheaded the work of a very expert staff.

The Senator from Missouri and this Senator from Pennsylvania have discussed this matter at length. I know of his very hard work, and I understand his preference for the Norfolk Southern offer. But were Norfolk Sourthern suddenly to withdraw from the picture, or were Norfolk Southern suddenly to be disqualified, then I believe it is a fair inference to say that the Senator from Missouri would have some interest in an alternative buyer. He might not necessarily lean to Morgan Stanley, or maybe he might. But he would be interested—as I think the Secretary of Transportaton would be, and the President of the United States—in making the best deal possible because of their underlying interest in privatizing Conrail.

So, there is way to accommodate the really basic thrusts which we have on the floor of the U.S. Senate today.

At an appropriate time, this Senator intends to offer an amendment to the pending legislation, S. 638, which would substitute the offer of Morgan Stanley, which this Senator says would satisfy the requirements of the Budget Act, would privatize Conrail, and would avoid an enormous number of complicated questions which this Senator feels will ultimately defeat the bid of Norfolk Southern.

The antitrust issues are enormous. The combination of the Norfolk Southern lines with these of Conrail is a violation of the antitrust laws, as the Department of Justice has stated. The efforts at divestiture are very weak indeed. The efforts at divestiture to Pittsburgh and Lake Erie and Guilford would be like sending the distinguished Senator from Ohio. [Mr. METZENBAUM] to stop "The Refrigerator" on a 1-yard plunge in the Super Bowl. It simply could not be done.

Even it this body gives approval ultimately to Norfolk Southern, this Senator predicts that a fair application by the Department of Justice will ultimately rule out that acquisition as being violative of the antitrust laws.

This body could save itself a great deal of time by avoiding further efforts to sell Conrail to Norfolk Southern, It is my view that Congress would save itself a great deal of time in the House of Representatives as well by taking up the Morgan Stanley offer. That proposal would accommodate the many conflicting contentions which have been advanced today. It would be in the national interest. It would satisfy the budget resolution issue. It would give more money to the U.S. Treasury—a minimum of $200 million by which the Morgan Stanley offer exceeds the Norfolk offer, an additional $24 million at least on the tax issue, and maybe as much as $400 million as projected by the Congressional Budget Office.

So there is a way to solve the problems for all involved, and I urge this body to give serious consideration to the proposal by Morgan Stanley for these reasons.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate resumes consideration of S. 638 at 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, the motion to waive section 303 of the Budget Act, which I have made, be the pending business, and that there be 1 hour for debate, equally divided between the Senator from Ohio and myself, and that the vote on that motion occur at 3 o'clock.

Mr. SPECTER. Objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, earlier this afternoon, I announced that within an hour or so I was going to propound a unanimous-consent request that the Danforth amendment to S. 638 be agreed to and be treated as original text for the purpose of further amendment. I stated at the time that it was my intention to make that unanimous-consent request later in the afternoon.

We have made an effort to run the hotlines on the unanimous-consent request. However, because a number of Senators on both sides are not in the area this afternoon, it it not possible to clear that unanimous-consent request. Therefore, I announce to the Senate that it is my intention to make such a request at some point tomorrow.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I modify my previous motion to strike from it the words "and any amendments thereto."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is so modified.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, when the Senate turns to S. 638 at 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, the Danforth motion to waive the Budget Act be the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

SALE OF CONRAIL TO NORFOLK SOUTHERN VIOLATES ANTITRUST LAWS

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, there is no doubt that the proposed sale of Conrail to the Norfolk Southern, as recommended in the committee substitute, raises the most serious kind of antitrust issues. What is more, the fact that Conrail is Government-owned creates real conflict-of-interest problems; Government must be particularly careful to ensure that its role as seller does not compromise a fair and impartial review of antitrust issues.

S. 638, however, does not take that kind of care. It does not provide any real due process for shippers, railroads, ports, and others who are adversely affected by the anticompetitive aspects of the proposed sale. Instead, the bill "deems" the sale approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, effectively ensuring no impartial review of the transaction by either the ICC or the courts. There is, therefore, no way to be sure that proposals the Norfolk Southern and the Department of Justice have made to resolve competitive concerns are sufficient to do so. I do not believe they are, and I do not see how, given the total absence of information on the antitrust issues, anyone can definitively argue otherwise.

The fact that selling Conrail to Norfolk Southern presents major antitrust problems is beyond dispute, Mr. President, even the Department of Justice conceded that without appropriate remedies the proposed merger would violate both the Interstate Commerce Act and the Clayton Antitrust Act. In a January 29, 1985, letter to Secretary of Transportation Dole, the then-Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust, J. Paul McGrath, stated:

> The merger would have a significant adverse effect on competition for the transport of commodities to and from a number of locations in several States, with the greatest corridor running between Buffalo and Pittsburgh in the east and St. Louis and Chicago in the west * * * the Department of Justice therefore would oppose the proposed merger unless its competitive problems are remedied * * *.

The dimensions of the antitrust problem become even more apparent if some of the factors the Department ignored are reviewed. Many observers, including two former Assistant Attorneys General for Anti-trust, have questioned the thoroughness of the Department's analysis. They believe the Department neglected to consider a number of issues that would have demonstrated that the antitrust problem was, and is, in fact, substantially larger than Justice admitted.

Justice failed to follow many of its normal procedures. It did not, for instance make use of the Herfindahl-Hirschman index, a means of identifying concentrated markets, in this case, despite the fact that this methodology was endorsed by Justice in both its 1982 and 1984 merger guidelines. Instead, the Department used a 50-10 test, examining only those markets where both Norfolk Southern and Conrail each had at least 10 percent of the market in rail transportation, and the two railroads together had at least 50 percent of the market. This inferior approach ensured that many competitive problem areas were not examined by Justice.

Further, Justice did not really consider market pairs. It analyzed traffic only to or from a point. This may sound sensible, but it can permit substantial anticompetitive impacts to remain unidentified. For example, Justice did not identify Chicago as either a problem origin or destination. However, Chicago shippers would face highly concentrated markets to a number of areas if Conrail and Norfolk Southern are combined. For example, NS carries 9.6 percent and Conrail 56.7 percent of the Chicago-Pittsburgh traffic, NS carries 6.9 percent and Conrail 75.4 percent of the Chicago-Cleveland traffic; and NS carries 11.2 percent and Conrail 80.3 percent of the Chicago to Buffalo Traffic.

Other analysts, using the techniques Justice ordinarily uses, found significantly larger antitrust problems than were identified by the Department. For example 16 State attorneys general, led by my good friend Neil Hartigan, the attorney general of Illinois, testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee that one study identified 53 business economic area pairs that under the formula traditionally used by the Justice Department would be considered highly concentrated markets where the merger would be likely to substantially lessen competition. This is much larger than the 30 counties that Justice found would be adversely affected.

Another aspect of the competitive problems the proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern presents can be seen by looking at the traffic that would be diverted from other railroads to a combined Conrail-Norfolk Southern system. In a report prepared for the House Commerce Committee, the staff of the Interstate Commerce Commission found that there could be over $330 million in traffic diverted from a number of railroads to a combined Norfolk Southern-Conrail system. To cite just a few examples, the Chicago & Northwestern could lose over $45 million in traffic; the Illinois Central Gulf could lose over $32 million; and the Grand Trunk Western could lose almost $29 million.

The United States Railway Association also found that a Conrail-Norfolk Southern combination would cause substantial diversions. Diversion estimates by individual railroads that would be affected were even higher. One set of estimates by a number of affected railroads showed that more than $677 million worth of traffic would be diverted to a Conrail-Norfolk Southern system, and that railroad employment of the adversely affected roads would decline by more than 8,100 jobs.

It's important to remember, Mr. President, that these diversions would not occur because a combination of Conrail and Norfolk Southern would be more efficient. Rather they would occur principally because of the monopoly power of the new railroad, which would be the largest carrier in the Nation. In fact, the head of the Federal Railway Association indirectly admitted as much when he told a meeting of eastern railroad officials last year that he did not believe there would be any transcontinental railroad mergers in the near future because there were not major efficiencies to be gained, the new larger systems would be difficult to manage, and most achievable efficiencies could be implemented through agreements between carriers. John Riley's argument is a good one, and it applies with almost equal force to the Conrail-Norfolk Southern situation.

I think it is worth detailing the kind of anticompetitive consequences that would be felt in my own State of Illinois as an example of the problems that an NS-Conrail merger could create. The merged system would dominate rail traffic to and from 18 counties in Illinois; in 10 of these counties, NS/Conrail would control more than 90 percent of the inbound and outbound tonnage, The merged system would give it 100 percent of the rail traffic between major Illinois cities and locations throughout the Nation. The merged system would use its routing power to divert traffic from competing rail carriers for movements between Illinois and other States, and reduce the benefits of rail rate and service competition for Illinois shippers and receivers. The merged system could also divert traffic from major Illinois Rail gateways such as Chicago and East St. Louis to the Kansas City gateway. Further, according to Illinois's attorney general, Neil Hartigan, Illinois could lose over 400 miles of railroad and over 1,000 rail jobs due to the merger.

What this all demonstrates is that the anticompetitive problems caused by a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern are very substantial, much more serious than the Justice Department first estimated—and Justice opposes the merger without appropriate divestitures. It also means that the antitrust problems are very widespread. Anticompetitive problems are not limited to the Conrail and Norfolk Southern territories. They extend well into the Midwest and West because of the impact this proposed merger would have on connecting railroads. The kind of problems I have described in Illinois will also be found in numerous other Eastern, Southern, Midwestern, and Western States to one degree or another. No State is immune from the consequences that would ripple out from a merger of this magnitude.

The ordinary rail merger approval process, Mr. President, provides a mechanism for handling antitrust issues such as those presented by the proposed Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger. Under current law, the Commission has 31 months to consider merger transactions. Commission approval then immunizes the merger from the antitrust laws. The ICC effectively functions as the antitrust forum, and has the authority to disapprove mergers as anticompetitive or to condition their approval on the implementation of appropriate remedies, such as divestitures, trackage rights agreements, and gateway agreements.

Importantly, ICC review provides all affected parties, including shippers, other railroads, and ports, for example, with full due process. These rights usually include full on-the-record proceedings, with the right to present evidence, and to cross-examine witnesses—in short, complete procedural due process.

The ICC also demands fairly complete disclosure by the railroads that are merging. The Commission requires the merging parties to provide:

First. An executive summary of the proposed transaction, listing in about 25 to 80 pages:

The proposed actions to implement the merger; construction necessary to tie the tracks together at key points; changes in traffic patterns; proposed abandonments; and environmental impacts as operations change and jobs move to other locations;

Second. An operating plan, identifying in detail changes in service, including:

Existing routes and terminals, traffic mix, route densities, and local service; major changes after the merger, such as changes at each common point, new through train schedules, discontinued trains, new crew districts, new route densities, and shifts in activities for major yards; rehabilitation projects proposed to maximize the benefits from consolidated services and projects avoided because of the merger; equipment utilization projects; and plans to coordinate and consolidate overhead functions such as purchasing, computers, sales offices, public affairs, legal, and planning.

Third. A traffic study identifying sources of additional revenue following the merger, including diversions that would occur as a result of the merger, together with the sources of this additional traffic. The merging partners must analyze place to place diversions, railroads that lose traffic, railroads that gain traffic, and truck traffic diversions.

Fourth. Pro forma balance sheets and income statements for a 3-year period following the proposed merger, and a sources and application of funds statement; and Fifth. A labor impact analysis, identifying job losses by geographic location, and job category, and identifying jobs relocated and jobs added.

This extensive documentation provides the basis for analysis of the merger, and there is ample opportunity for all parties to test it, to challenge it, and to otherwise act to verify its accuracy. This kind of record has been available in every past railroad merger between profitable railroads, but it is not available in this case. Norfolk Southern has provided almost none of the documentation normally available in merger cases. The shippers, railroads, ports, employees, and others who would be adversely affected by the merger have had virtually no opportunity to see relevant data, to testify themselves, or to cross-examine Norfolk Southern officials.

There has been no due process in this case. S. 638 and the Northeast Rail Services Act together work to totally immunize the sale of Conrail from review by the Interstate Commerce Commission or from judicial review using antitrust law standards applicable to most other mergers. S. 638 provides no substitute process to protect the rights of those adversely affected. Instead, it seems designed to ensure that there is no independent review, and little or no available evidence on which to base such a review.

Now some would argue that the Justice Department has undertaken the kind of review that needs to be provided. However, the Justice Department has had multiple roles in this transaction. Justice was the advisor to Secretary Dole before she selected a bid. Justice is the Government's lawyer, and the Government owns Conrail. And Justice has never undertaken the kind of review that could be called full and independent. Donald I. Baker, a former assistant attorney general for antitrust commented in an April article in the National Law Journal on some of the things Justice has failed to do in reviewing the Conrail sale:

It has not looked at whether there are any less anticompetitive alternative purchase offers available.

It has not publicly analyzed the viability of the Conrail 'public offering' proposal—which would keep Conrail as an independent competitor.

It has not used the Heffindahl-Hirshman index, its standard for measuring anticompetitive effects under the merger guidelines.

It has not weighed the 'efficiency' claims in anything but very general terms.

It has not yet publicly analyzed the probable viability of the proposed spinoffs to Guilford and Pittsburgh and Lake Erie, or the associated conditions.

It has not issued civil investigative demands for documents or taken depositions of anybody.

Instead, the Department has negotiated in secret with the Norfolk Southern, in an attempt to facilitate the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern on behalf of the Department of Transportation. Justice, which has admitted that it does not have the in-house expertise to fully analyze rail mergers, has not yet even hired a consultant to review the latest Norfolk Southern divestiture proposal. Whatever one might say about the Department's role in this case, it is crystal clear that the justice's work to date does not constitute a full and independent analysis of the antitrust issues.

Mr. President, as I stated earlier, the kind of inadequate review of antitrust issues that Justice has provided, followed by complete immunity from administrative or judicial antitrust review as provided by S. 638 is not the ordinary way rail mergers are handled. In fact, the Interstate Commerce Commission is now considering a merger just as large as the proposed Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger—the Santa Fe-Southern Pacific merger. The Santa Fe case was filed on March 23, 1984. Santa Fe submitted extensive information on the merger and its consequences. The ICC has held hearings and all parties have had the opportunity to present testimony, and to cross-examine Santa Fe and Southern Pacific witnesses on issues raised by the proposed merger. I understand that the Commission will make its decision in the first half of this year, that is, within a year or 15 months of the time it was filed.

It is worth taking a little time to contrast the role of the Department of Justice in this case as opposed to the Conrail case. Justice is opposing the Santa Fe merger, although the anticompetitive problems it presents are less than half as large—and perhaps several times smaller—than the problems presented by the Norfolk Southern proposal. Justice estimated that roughly 6.2 million tons of freight, or about $240 million, would present antitrust problems in the Santa Fe case. Justice's own analysis showed that a Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger presented problems for over 19 million tons of freight, or about $527 million in revenues, and over $500 million worth of other problems were excluded from its analysis.

In the Santa Fe case, Justice said that even extensive divestitures and trackage rights would not be adequate to solve the antitrust problems. Further Justice rejected the "deep pockets" argument in that case, arguing that the Southern Pacific could make it on its own, even though several measures of SP's economic health are significantly worse than Conrails. Finally, a Justice Department consultant, Dr. Pittman, in testifying on the Santa Fe case, admitted the inadequacies of the analysis in the Conrail case. When questioned about the disparity between the Department's analysis in the Santa Fe case and the Conrail-Norfolk Southern case, he conceded "I think I included some products by using both kinds of analysis, which it's conceivable that the Conrail analysis omitted unwisely."

Even though its Conrail Analysis was woefully inadequate when compared with its work in the Santa Fe case, Justice nonetheless understood that there were severe antitrust problems with a Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger, Mr. President. Its clear that those problems were extensive enough to warrant total Justice Department opposition to the Merger—as in the Santa Fe case. However, because Justice was under severe pressure from the Department of transportation to help DOT implement its sale recommendations, Justice attempted to negotiate a package of divestitures to resolve at least part of the competitive issues.

Justice's efforts have produced not one, but at least three different divestiture proposals by the Norfolk Southern. All three proposals have been built around packages of line sales and trackage rights to two very marginal railroads, Guilford—a regional New England Railroad—and the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie.

Justice established three basic conditions for a divestiture proposal that would ensure competitive service. First, the acquiring railroads must demonstrate that they possess the managerial, operational, and financial capability to compete effectively, and to remain viable over the long-term so that there was some assurance of their ability to provide long-term rail service along the affected corridors. Second, the divestiture should provide the acquirer direct connections in Buffalo, Chicago, Toledo, and East St. Louis to one or more railroads other than Conrail-Norfolk Southern or CSX. Third, after the divestiture, shippers in affected counties located on Conrail-Norfolk Southern must have access through reciprocal switching or other arrangements to the divestiture carrier.

The first divestiture proposal effectively met none of these goals. The lines proposed to be transferred to Guilford, for example, while providing access to East St. Louis on the map, were in such poor shape that there would be no way for Guilford to offer any real service over the route. Further, the proposal did nothing for shippers in a number of counties where justice admitted there are competitive problems.

Most fundamentally, however, neither Guilford or the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie are railroads healthy enough, or which could become healthy enough in the near future, to provide effective long-term competition to a merged Conrail-Norfolk Southern system. In an August 30, 1985 report to the House Commerce Committee, the staff of the Interstate Commerce Commission concluded that neither Guilford nor the P&LE could survive as long term, viable carriers competing against the proposed new merged railroad. Regarding Guilford, the report said:

Because [Guilford's] assumptions generally are without merit, Guilford's proposal will not result in a viable post-divestiture operation.

As to the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie, the report concluded that the—

P&LE is not now a financially viable carrier and its acquisition of the new lines will not enable it to reverse its already precarious financial position.

The Justice Department hired a consultant, R.L. Banks and Associates to review the proposed divestiture plan after admitting that it "does not have the in-house expertise to evaluate technical and operational aspects of any proposed divestiture." The preliminary Banks report came to much the same conclusion as the ICC staff report. Regarding Guilford, the Banks report said:

[Guilford's] "viability would be dependent heavily upon the realization of several optimistic assumptions, and . . . even under the most favorable circumstances, GTI's [Guilford's] continued existence would be parlous".

The report went on to state:

Doubts about the realism of the marketing and operating plans apply equally to the financial statements; the very real possibility that GTI [Guilford] would fail to realize projected gains in revenues and efficiency, leads to the conclusion that survival of an expanded GTI [Guilford] system is yet to be proven.

The Banks reports conclusions regarding the P&LE were even more devastating. The report found that:

Review of available financial date for the P&LE * * * raises serious concern as to whether a business plan and financing agreement can be developed that would allow an affirmative finding with respect to the likely long-term viability of the P&LE.

These independent reports demonstrated the inadequacy of the first divestiture proposal, and made it impossible for DOT to move forward with the merger. Norfolk Southern therefore developed a second divestiture proposal. DOT and Justice had learned their lesson, however. There would be no opportunity for independent review of divestiture proposals. Nonetheless, the second divestiture proposal was also quickly seen to be hopelessly inadequate.

Last November, therefore, a summary of a third divestiture plan was released. The plan includes extensive trackage rights over Conrail lines for Guilford—over 1,000 miles—together with certain line sales. P&LE would also purchase lines and receive trackage rights under the third proposal. On November 19, the Justice Department announced that the third plan:

Appears on its face to address the competitive concerns that must be addressed before the Department can approve Norfolk Southern's acquisition. * * *

I do not understand, Mr. President, how the Justice Department was able to reach that conclusion. At the time Justice made its announcement it did not have:

The written agreements between Norfolk Southern and Guilford and P&LE setting out the terms and conditions of the latest divestiture plan, including such fundamental matters as the total price to be paid by the P&LE for the lines to be acquired by it.

Marketing and operating plans for Guilford and P&LE, including projected train schedules and supporting date for revenue and cost projections.

Financial projections for Guilford and P&LE, including sources of funding for the payments to be made to Norfolk Southern in respect to line acquisitions, equipment purchases, leasehold arrangements, and track and yard rehabilitation; pro forma financials showing anticipated revenues and expenditures in the first full year of operations following divestiture; and balance sheets for the pro forma year; and Density projections showing the likely volume of traffic to be handled over the raillines and trackage rights to be acquired by Guilford and P&LE, together with projections of commodity mix sufficient to form a reasonable basis for projections of anticipated revenue.

As I understand it, Justice still does not have this information. What is more, no one else has seen it either, or been able to analyze whatever information Justice might have. Justice refused to hear from any of the parties that would be adversely affected by the merger regarding the divestiture proposal.

On the basis of what little information is available, however, there is little doubt about the adequacy of the third divestiture proposal. There is virtually no reason to believe that the latest proposal will result in effective rail competition.

First, there is still no evidence to indicate that Guilford and the P&LE will ever be anything more then extremely marginal carriers. Guilford lost $29 million in the 1982–84 period, and the P&LE lost even more, over $45 million in the 1982–84 timeframe.

There is, on the other hand, strong reason to believe that Guilford's and P&LE's very existence in the future would be dependent on the sufferance of the Conrail-Norfolk Southern System. Guilford and P&LE together had revenues of only about $350 million in 1984, as opposed to revenues of almost $7 billion that year for a combined Conrail-NS. In fact, considering that the Department of Transportation argues that Conrail, with its excellent facilities and 5-year history of increasing profits, is not viable over the long term, it is hard to imagine how the administration could ever contend with a straight face that Guilford or the P&LE would ever be viable enough to provide effective competition.

Second, the plan fails to provide for any new rail service in 15 of the 30 counties where the Justice Department admitted new service was essential. Where rail service is offered, it is often competitively inferior. In fact, it is hard to imagine how the marginal Guilford and P&LE railroads, both of which need major rehabilitation, can compete with the high-capacity and well-maintained Conrail and Norfolk Southern Systems.

Third, the plan is insensitive to the needs of employees, shippers, and communities. It would force many Conrail employees, who have already been through painful restructuring, through another unnecessary restucturing process.

Fourth, the plan fails to address in any realistic fashion the diversion problems facing railroads that connect with Conrail. It does nothing, for example, to ensure that a Conrail-Norfolk Southern System would not use its monopoly power to divert traffic from the Chicago and East St. Louis gateways to the Kansas City gateway. It is worth remembering that the Federal Government has invested substantial sums into upgrading the Chicago and Northwestern's line from the West into Chicago. Diversion of traffic off the Northwestern to Conrail-Norfolk Southern at Kansas City would work to undercut that investment.

Finally, because the plan calls for granting the divestiture carriers substantial trackage rights over Conrail, there is a real question as to where the plan is in accordance with at least the spirit of the Northeast Rail Services Act. That act expressed Congress' clear preference for selling Conrail as a unit, and not breaking it up. Yet the plan transfers substantial trackage rights over Conrail lines to the divestiture carriers.

The Department of Justice indicated in its statement on the third divestiture plan that it intended to have a consultant review the proposal and report back. It is now 2 months since the Department made its statement, yet the Department has not even picked a consultant. I do not believe a consultant's analysis could possibly cure the procedural and substantive errors involved with the third divestiture plan. However, I do believe that the absence of the consultant's report is a strong indication that the Department of Justice is afraid of what an independent analyst would find.

Let me conclude, Mr. President, by summarizing the reasons I believe S. 638 is so flawed on antitrust grounds. Selling Conrail to Norfolk Southern would create the largest railroad in our Nation. It is a merger that everyone admits raises serious antitrust problems, even the Department of Justice. The Antitrust Division's analysis, however, was inadequate, and greatly underestimated the anticompetitive effects of the proposed merger.

What is even worse, the Antitrust Division and the Department of Transportation have followed a procedure that seems designed not to uncover antitrust problems, and to ensure that they are not resolved in any effective way. The process has been closed. Shippers, railroads, ports, and others who would be adversely affected have had no opportunity to present their case.

This is not the ordinary way mergers are handled. Every other merger between profitable railroads has been considered by the Interstate Commerce Commission where all parties have had full procedural rights. The ICC process also works to ensure that all parties have access to the kind of information necessary to consider antitrust issues—information that has been so sadly lacking in this case.

Further, Justice has not played an independent role in this case; it has instead acted as DOT's lawyer in attempting to do everything possible to expedite a sale. It has analyzed the Norfolk Southern-Conrail merger using different standards than it has in other cases, including the Santa Fe-Southern Pacific case. The Department opposes the Santa Fe merger, even though the anticompetitive impacts are much smaller than in the Norfolk Southern case. In that case, the Department found divestitures to be inadequate, while now it supports divestitures.

The divestiture proposal that Norfolk Southern is now proposing is hopelessly flawed. It is based on two railroads—Guilford and the P&LE—who simply do not have the financial wherewithal to provide effective competition. And the proposal does nothing to resolve a number of the antitrust issues, such as the Midwest diversion problem.

It seems to me that the Government is in a real conflict of interest in this situation. Because the Government owns Conrail, it should be particularly careful to see that its role as owner does not preclude full and fair analysis of the antitrust remedies, followed by implementation of remedies appropriate to ensure that competitive issues are resolved. But that is not what S. 638 has done. Instead that bill "deems" the merger approved by the ICC, and precludes review of the antitrust issues by the courts.

Mr. President, I do not believe the Senate wants to ignore the antitrust concerns presented by this huge merger. I'm sure my colleagues want to know that adequate information is available on antitrust issues, that they get independent review, and that all parties have a chance to make their case.

Antitrust considerations deserve the kind of attention that S. 638 so studiously avoids. Congress should act to return Conrail to the private sector, but not in a manner that so totally ignores the competitive concerns raised by the Norfolk Southern offer. It is possible to return Conrail to the private sector in a manner that is in accordance with our antitrust laws. I urge my colleagues to join me in working to ensure that the Senate adopts that course of action.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. TRIBLE (for himself, Mr. COHEN, and Mr. WARNER):

S. 2020. A bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to expand the class of individuals eligible for refunds or other returns of contributions from contingency reserves in the employees health benefits fund; to make miscellaneous amendments relating to the civil service retirement system and the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES BENEFITS IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, last May, Blue Cross/Blue Shield first announced plans to offer premium rebates to policy holders under the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program. These rebates were made possible by a decreasing rise in health care costs and increasingly responsible use of health care resources by policy holders. Subscribers, Congress and the administration welcomed this news and the rebates were eagerly awaited.

As my colleagues will recall, soon after this announcement by Blue Cross/Blue Shield, it was discovered that current law permits such refunds for employees of the Federal Government only. Federal retirees are ineligible.

In response, I introduced legislation last July which corrected this deficiency in the law and permitted Federal retirees to receive rebates along with their currently employed Federal counterparts. Representative FRANK WOLF introduced similar legislation in the House of Representatives.

Since that time, this legislation—originally aimed at providing premium rebates for Federal retirees—has evolved into legislation making a number of changes in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program and other programs including the civil service retirement system. Finally, after many months of deliberations, Congress passed this measure shortly before adjourning in December. Federal employees and retirees who had been waiting 7 months for passage of this measure, believed that their premium refunds would be in the mail shortly.

Unfortunately, this long awaited measure was recently vetoed by the President. While enthusiastically supporting the health insurance premium rebates, the President objected to provisions in the legislation lifting the existing cap on the Government's share of contributions to the health insurance premiums.

Mr. President, over 2 million Federal employees and retirees have now been waiting over 8 months to receive their premium rebates. These individuals have been patiently waiting for Congress and the President to enact legislation that would correct an oversight in existing law and provide retirees as well as employees with premium refunds. Eight months is an unacceptable length of time to wait for enactment of legislation which enjoys overwhelming bipartisan support.

Therefore Mr. President, I am introducing legislation along with Senators COHEN and WARNER, which I hope will be enacted quickly. The legislation incorporates nearly all provisions of the final version of the health insurance rebate bill which passed Congress in December. However, this measure addresses the concerns which prompted the President to veto the rebate bill, by eliminating the language regarding Government contributions.

In addition to providing authority for retirees to receive rebates, this legislation provides for open seasons before the start of any contract year in which there are changes in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program. Additional modifications are made in the Federal Health Program including reinstatement of authority to make payments to nonmedical health care providers in medically underserved areas.

My legislation also incorporates modifications in the civil service retirement system. A number of technical clarificaitons are made to the Civil Service Retirement Spouse Equity Act of 1984 regarding benefits for former spouses. And, this measure includes provisions I originally introduced to give Federal retirees a second chance to provide survivor benefits for their spouse.

I urge my colleagues to support this measure and join with me in pressing for immediate passage of this legislation. We must not require Federal employees and retirees to continue to wait for the legislation needed to provide them with rebates.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2020

By Mr. TRIBLE (for himself and Mr. ARMSTRONG):

S. 2021. A bill to authorize humanitarian assistance for the National Union for Total Independence of Angola [UNITA]; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

U.S. ASSISTANCE TO ANTI-COMMUNIST REBELS IN ANGOLA

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, today I have introduced legislation on behalf of myself and Mr. ARMSTRONG, authorizing much-needed humanitarian assistance to the anti-Communist rebel forces under Jonas Savimbi—the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola [UNITA]. This action will serve as another symbol of America's resolve to assist those resisting Communist oppression.

Last year, the Congress took an important step by repealing the Clark amendment. Today and in the days ahead, it is crucial that we take the additional step of providing direct aid to the anti-Communist freedom fighters under Jonas Savimbi.

Only in the past several years has the United States been willing to provide visible, substantial assistance to freedom fighters around the world. In Afghanistan and in Nicaragua, we have offered support to those forces resisting tyranny.

Regrettably, we have failed to offer the same support to Jonas Savimbi and his anti-Communist forces, support which is needed now more than ever.

Mr. President, 10 years ago, the Portuguese withdrew from Angola. Shortly thereafter, the Marxist Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola [MPLA] seized power, and was promptly rewarded with a massive infusion of Soviet and Cuban assistance. A mere 1 month after declaring a Marxist state, the MPLA received an estimated $50 million in Soviet aid, together with several thousand Cuban combat troops and hundreds of Soviet advisers.

Over the years, the presence of Soviet and Cuban personnel in Angola has multiplied. Today, an estimated 5,000 to 10,000 advisers from the Soviet Union, East Germany, and Cuba are present in Angola. So too are an estimated 30,000 Cuban combat personnel.

Over these years too, the Angolan people's hopes for democracy and freedom have been crushed. The MPLA's constitution provides for popular participation in the Government. But it is the only legal political party in Angola. The party's opponents have been outlawed, and as a consequence, Angolan citizens have no opportunity to change their Government.

Moreover, the MPLA has proscribed virtually every basic right. The State Department's country reports on human rights practices paints a dismal portrait of Angolan life:

In Angola today, there is no semblance of due process, with respect to either arrests or trials.

There is no freedom to travel within Angola, and very little opportunity to leave.

There is no freedom of speech.

There is no freedom of the press.

There is no freedom of assembly.

Moreover, Cuban forces appear increasingly bent on reigning in the activities of the Christian church in Angola. At present, the majority of Angolans are Christians, and perhaps for this reason, the MPLA has not moved to shut down all churches. But the Government continues to emphasize the importance of atheism and remains critical of religion. Several weeks ago, I sponsored a showing of two films which detailed the bombing of churches by Cuban military personnel.

Simply put, we are witnessing a massive effort by the Soviet Union, Cuba, and the Marxist MPLA to extinguish the last vestiges of freedom in Angola. And this, we must not allow. Throughout our history, Americans have believed that freedom is the birthright of all people, that victories against poverty are greatest and peace most secure when people are free.

Recently, this Congress opened the door to aiding the UNITA forces by repealing the ill-advised Clark amendment, which for a decade had banned U.S. assistance to the Angolan rebels. We must now walk through that opened door. It is time again for the United States to fulfill its historic promise to combat tyranny and foster freedom around the world.

The legislation will reward those forces in Angola who believe in freedom and who are committed to democracy. I urge my colleagues to join us in the effort to aid the UNITA rebels by cosponsoring this important bill, and ask that the text of it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there are authorized to be appropriated to such department or agency of the United States as the President shall designate, except the Central Intelligence Agency or the Department of Defense, $27,000,000 for humanitarian assistance to the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA).

SEC. 2. As used in this Act, the term "humanitarian assistance" means the provision of food, clothing, medicine, and other humanitarian assistance, and it does not include the provision of weapons, weapons systems, ammunition, or other equipment, vehicles, or material which can be used to inflict serious bodily harm or death.

By Mr. METZENBAUM:

S. 2022. A bill to amend the Clayton Act regarding antitrust enforcement; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ANTITRUST IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to reform and improve our antitrust laws. This legislation has three fundamental objectives: First, to strengthen antitrust remedies; second, to provide for careful consideration of cost reductions and foreign competition in antitrust analysis; and third, to improve antitrust enforcement.

Three times in our Nation's history Congress has enacted major legislation to prevent conduct that hurt competition. In 1890, Congress enacted the law that remains today the most comprehensive and fundamental statement of our antitrust principles, the Sherman Act. In 1914, Congress strengthened the antitrust laws by enacting the Clayton Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act. In 1950, Congress was again concerned that mergers were reducing competition and injuring the economy. It responded by strengthening the law once again in enacting the Cellar-Kefauver Act.

These laws have served this country well. When they have been enforced, they have prevented mergers that would harm competition, discouraged price fixing, and deterred large companies from attempting to drive small rivals out of existence through unfair means.

Over the last 5 years, our Nation has witnesses a misguided retreat from fundamental antitrust principles. This administration has consistently cut back on enforcement and attempted to reinterpret the law whenever possible to reduce its effectiveness. The result has been the most permissive antitrust climate in this century.

The administration is not content with only lax enforcement. It wants to change the antitrust laws permanently to make sure that no future administration can adopt a different set of policies. It has proposed legislation to undercut both private and public enforcement of the antitrust laws. I will strongly oppose this effort and I urge my colleagues in the Congress to join me.

The legislation I am introducing today also is intended to reform the antitrust laws, but not in the way the administration is proposing. This legislation will help restore the antitrust laws to a vigorous and important role in the Nation's economic policy.

THE LEVEL OF MERGER ACTIVITY

Before I explain my proposal, let me review the record of the last 6 years in merger activity.

In 1983 the total number of mergers was 2,533, up 8 percent from 1982. This was the highest annual count since 1974. The total dollar value paid for all transactions in 1983 was $73.1 billion, up 36 percent from $53.8 billion in 1982. The 1983 total was just short of the all-time record of $82.6 billion in 1981. Deals of $100 million or larger have risen steadily from 94 in 1980, 113 in 1981, 116 in 1982, 137 in 1983 to 200 in 1984.

The extraordinarily high level of merger activity continued in 1984. There were 2,543 acquisitions in 1984, even higher than the 1983 level. In addition, the number of acquisitions of over $100 million in value was up 47 percent from the 1983 level. During the first half of 1985, there were 1,563 acquisitions. This rate over all of 1985 would have resulted in 3,126 mergers, an increase of 583 over 1984, and the largest since 1974.

In addition to the large number of total mergers, the number of massive combinations has far exceeded any period in our Nation's history. Incredibly, the largest 16 mergers in the history of the country have occurred during the permissive climate that has existed since this administration took office. The table below shows the top 16 mergers.

Year and acquisition	Value (In billions of dollars)
1984: Gulf-Socal	13.2
1984: Texaco, Inc.-Getty	10.1
1981: Dupont-Conoco	8.0
1981: United States Steel-Marathon	6.6
1984: Mobil Corp.-Superior Oil	5.7
1985: General Foods Corp.-Philip Morris	5.6
1984: Royal Dutch Shell-Domestic Shell	5.2
1983: Southern Pacific-Santa Fe	5.1
1985: Hughes Aircraft-General Motors	5.0
1985: Reynolds-Nabisco	5.0
1985: Allied Corp.-Signal	4.5
1981: Societe Nationale Elf Aquitaine-Texas Gulf	4.3
1981: Connecticut General Corp.-INA Corp.	4.2
1982: Occidental-Cities Service Corp.	4.1
1985: United States Steel-Texas Oil and Gas	4.1
1985: Baxter Travenol-American Hospital Supply	3.7

Note.—This list does not include the pending proposed mergers of Beatrice-Kohlberg, Kravis, Roberts ($6.2 billion) and GE-RCA ($6.3 billion).

There is little doubt that this merger wave can be traced directly to the signals coming from this administration. Business Week in February 1984 reported:

The trend to concentration, which started as a series of survival moves in the last recession, has developed a powerful momentum.

It also noted that companies are more likely to decide that a merger is the most attractive alternative after—a hint from their advisers that the time to combine is during this "window of opportunity" opened by the Reagan administration's antitrust policy.

Congress cannot change the officials in charge of antitrust enforcement at the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department. However, we can improve and strengthen the existing antitrust laws.

IMPROVING REMEDIES

The bill I am introducing today makes a number of substantial improvements to remedies available in antitrust cases. First, it allows the Federal antitrust agencies to bring an action on behalf of consumers to recover damages on their behalf. The recovery would be distributed to consumers in any reasonable way possible.

Under current law, the Justice Department cannot sue on behalf of injured consumers. While the courts have not clearly stated the authority of the FTC, it has never brought a case directly seeking consumer redress for antitrust violations and its authority is at least very doubtful. This provision recognizes that there are many cases when private litigation is not a feasible way for consumers to be compensated. In 1976, Congress gave authority to State attorneys general to sue on behalf of injured consumers. This authority has produced substantial benefits by allowing State authorities to pursue actions where consumers would not otherwise have been compensated. Giving this same authority to the Federal enforcement agencies is necessary in cases which affect consumers of many States and are not practical for a single State attorney general to bring.

The bill also authorizes the Federal enforcement agencies and the State attorneys general to sue for damages by indirect purchasers, consumers who do not buy directly from parties to the antitrust violation. The Supreme Court held in the Illinois Brick decision that indirect purchasers could not pursue a claim under the antitrust laws. If all the major automobile manufacturers engaged in price-fixing, only dealers could bring a case. This unfair principle must be changed.

It is true that authorizing suits by indirect purchasers introduces some complexity in sorting out damages between direct and indirect purchasers. The bill deals with this problem by providing that parties with both types of claims should normally present their claims in the same proceeding. This approach allows the Court to conduct the case in the most efficient way possible and to insure that the defendant is not forced to pay twice for the same injury.

Another improvement in antitrust remedies is to require that divestitures which are undertaken to resolve an anticompetitive merger must fully restore competition lost as a result of the merger. The antitrust agencies have recently approved merger settlements in which the divestitures were not adequate to cure the competitive problem. In fact, the Justice Department and the FTC appear to accept the principle that partial divestitures do not have to fully restore competition. In addition, the bill provides that divestitures to acceptable purchasers should be arranged before the merger is approved and that the interests of employees should be considered in approving partial divestitures as a settlement of an unlawful merger.

The bill also strengthens remedies by allowing successful plaintiffs to obtain interest from the time of the violation, allowing the United States to receive treble damages for suits in its own behalf, and clarifying that divestiture is available to private parties in a merger case.

COST REDUCTIONS AND FOREIGN COMPETITION

The antitrust laws have not been the cause of our crisis in foreign trade. The trade deficit has grown steadily worse as the anitrust climate has become more permissive. The administration would like to point to antitrust as a way of diverting attention from its disastrous trade policies.

Our problem in international competition is not that American companies are too small. American firms are already the largest in the world in automobiles, steel, electronics, and textiles, as well as other industries. The Japanese have 9 automobile manufacturers, 44 textile manufacturers, over 30 companies making steel products, and over 90 manufacturers of electrical products in a domestic market less than half the size of the United States. Yet the Japanese are the symbol of our strongest international competition.

It would be a disastrous mistake for the Congress to create a broad antitrust exemption for industries hurt by foreign competition. The result would be to increase permanently concentration in many of our basic industries. In the long run, we would be less efficient, not more. We would do more poorly in foreign markets, not better. A recent study by economists at the Federal Trade Commission concluded:

> A general policy of liberalizing the antitrust laws for declining industries would * * * permit mergers with potential anticompetitive effects even though no justification could be offered based on efficiencies and foreign competition. It might be suggested that such mergers would nevertheless be justified to save jobs in areas hard hit by declining employment and/or to improve the balance of trade. However, * * * there is no persuasive reason to believe that the mergers that would be allowed under the liberalization in question would increase employment or improve the trade balance. (Frankena and Pautler, "Antitrust Policy for Declining Industries," FTC, October 1985).

The truth is that the massive wave of mergers we have experienced over the last few years has been a failure for American industry. Business Week recently reported that one out of three mergers is undone. A recent management consulting study of major acquisitions showed 62 percent of them failed to meet basic tests of success. A study by 14 economists of mergers between 1962 and 1972 showed mergers in the United States did not increase profits and tended to slow down the growth rate of the firm.

Such merger disasters as the Penn Central Railroad combination, the Pan Am acquisition of National, Mobil's acquisition of Montgomery Ward, Exxon-Reliance Electric, Standard Oil of Ohio-Kennecott, and Flour Corp.-St. Joe Minerals, are a few on the long list of failures. Yet each of them was justified as promising efficiencies and higher profits for the acquiring company.

The antitrust laws should not permit large mergers which threaten competition on the bare hope and speculative arguments by the companies that they will promote international competitiveness. On the other hand, we need to ensure that the antitrust laws do accommodate the reality of foreign competition and the possibility that a merger will reduce costs. In some cases, a merger will enable a firm to streamline its operations and to reduce production costs. In other cases, foreign imports will offset any harm from competition from the merger of American companies. The bill I am introducing today insures that these factors will be taken into account in assessing whether mergers will harm competition.

We must be particularly careful in how these factors are taken into account, however. Otherwise, they will serve as a loophole to justify mergers that should not be permitted. Companies who want to merge now routinely claim vast efficiencies in trying to justify their merger to the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department. Some have even claimed that tax savings or other financial manipulations should count in favor of the merger. The antitrust agencies should consider efficiency claims in the exercise of prosecutorial discretion but only if the merging companies prove by clear and convincing evidence that their merger will substantially lower costs and that prices will be reduced, too.

Similarly, foreign competition should be considered in assessing a proposed merger but only if we can be reasonably sure that foreign imports will actually offset the possible harm to competition from an unlawful merger. The bill I am introducing today sets out a careful standard for taking these factors into account.

The general standards in the antitrust laws now are flexible enough to accommodate consideration of these factors. However, there are substantial benefits in incorporating careful standards into the law. Doing so will eliminate any misunderstanding that these factors can be considered as well as insure that these factors are not used so loosely that they become a justification for mergers that will really harm competition.

IMPROVING ENFORCEMENT

The third major objective of the bill is to improve enforcement. First, in order to improve antitrust review of large mergers by the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission, the bill provides for a longer waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act for mergers over $1 billion in value. Second, the bill allows State attorneys general to have access to information filed under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act to facilitate their own enforcement actions. Both these provisions will encourage more careful review of proposed mergers.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a more detailed explanation of the bill and its text be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

If the divestiture required by a consent agreement, consent decree, or order is not approved, such agreement, decree, or order may be rescinded by the Commission or court and the Commission or the Attorney General may petition the court for further relief or, if appropriate, initiate an action or proceeding to consider the legality of the acquisition and the need for further relief.

"(b) The provisions of consent decrees proposed by the Attorney General or the Commission and consent agreements proposed by the Commission shall be enforceable, consistent with the terms of the agreement or proposed decree, after agreement by the persons subject to the provisions of the consent decree or agreement, in accordance with procedures authorized by law for enforcement of final orders and decrees.

COST REDUCTION AND IMPROVING COMPETITION

SEC. 5. (a) The Federal Trade Commission and the Attorney General shall, pursuant to section 7A(d) of the Clayton Act, promulgate rules within 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act, specifying information to be provided by persons, subject to subsection (a) of section 7A of such Act, who claim that an acquisition of securities or assets or a joint venture will reduce the costs of operation and thereby promote competition. Such information shall be limited to specific reductions in the costs of production, distribution, transportation, or, in exceptional cases, other factors directly related to firm operations. The Federal Trade Commission and the Attorney General shall take into account such information in determining whether to initiate an action under any of the antitrust laws or the Federal Trade Commission Act.

(b) In any case in which the Federal Trade Commission or the Attorney General declines to initiate an action regarding an acquisition or joint venture on the grounds that the acquisition or joint venture is likely to promote competition through reducing costs, the agency primarily responsible for the antitrust review shall certify that the parties have demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence that—

(1) costs of operation are likely to be substantially reduced directly as a result of the proposed acquisition or joint venture,

(2) the cost reduction is likely to lead to reduced prices, and promote competition, and

(3) there is no reasonable alternative method for achieving such cost reductions other than the proposed acquisition or joint venture.

(c) In the event such a certification is made, it may be offered by any party to any action under the antitrust laws or the Federal Trade Commission Act alleging that the acquisition or joint venture violates such laws and shall be relevant in determining whether the acquisition or joint venture may substantially lessen competition.

FOREIGN COMPETITION

SEC. 6. The Clayton Act is amended by adding between section 7B, as added by this Act, and section 8, the following:

"FOREIGN COMPETITION

"Foreign competition shall be considered in determining whether an acquisition or joint venture may substantially lessen competition to the extent that—

"(1) there is a substantial likelihood that foreign sales in the United States will increase significantly in response to a reduction in competition resulting from the acquisition or joint venture, and

"(2) such increase will substantially offset any harm from such reduction.".

TIME FOR REVIEW OF MERGERS

SEC. 7. (a) Section 7A(b)(1)(B) of the Clayton Act is amended by striking out "(or in the case of a cash tender offer, the fifteenth day)".

(b) Section 7A(e) of the Clayton Act is amended—

(2) in paragraph (2) by striking out "(or in the case of a cash tender offer, 10 days)", and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) If, as a result of an acquisition to which subsection (a) applies the acquiring person would hold an aggregate total amount of the voting securities or assets of the acquired person in excess of $1,000,000,000 in value, the additional waiting period provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection shall be 60 days.".

INFORMATION TO STATE ATTORNEYS GENERAL

SEC. 8. Section 7A(h) of the Clayton Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: ", or to officers and employees of appropriate Federal law enforcement agencies or to any officer or employee of any State law enforcement agency upon the prior certification of an officer of any such Federal or State law enforcement agency that such information or documentary material will be maintained in confidence. The maintenance of confidence requirement does not preclude any use of such information or documentary material for official law enforcement purposes, including the preparation of comments regarding consent agreements or decrees proposed by the Commission or the Attorney General under any of the antitrust laws or the Federal Trade Commission Act".

PRIVATE REMEDIES

SEC. 9. Section 16 of the Clayton Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Injunctive relief under this section may include equitable remedies of dissolution, rescission, partial divestiture, and related equitable remedies.".

(1) inserting after "sustained,", in the first sentence, the following: "simple interest on the actual damages for the period beginning on the date of service of such person's pleading setting forth a claim under the antitrust laws or the Federal Trade Commission Act and ending on the date of judgment, such interest to be adjusted by the court if it finds that the award of all or part of such interest is unjust under the circumstances,"; and

(2) striking out, beginning with "The court may" in the second sentence, all that follows through the end of such subsection.

(b) Section 4A of the Clayton Act is amended by—

(1) inserting after "sustained," in the first sentence, the following: ", simple interest on actual damages for the period beginning on the date of service of the pleading of the United States setting forth a claim under the antitrust laws and ending on the date of judgment, such interest to be adjusted by the court if it finds that the award of all or part of such interest is unjust under the circumstances,"; and

(2) striking out, beginning with "The court may" in the second sentence, all that follows through the end of such section.

(c) Section 4C(a)(2) of the Clayton Act is amended by—

(1) inserting after "this subsection," the following: "simple interest on the total damage for the period beginning on the date of service of the pleading of the United States or the State setting forth a claim under the antitrust laws and ending on the date of judgment, such interest to be adjusted by the court if it finds that the award of all or part of such interest is unjust under the circumstances,"; and

(2) striking out, beginning with "The court may" in the second sentence, and all that follows through the end of such subsection.

ANTITRUST IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1986

BASIC APPROACH

The Antitrust Improvement Act of 1986 makes changes in the antitrust laws in three areas—(1) improving remedies for antitrust violations; (2) providing guidelines for the consideration of foreign competition and possible efficiencies from mergers; and (3) strengthening enforcement. In each area, the objective of the bill is to promote more vigorous enforcement of the antitrust laws against conduct that harms competition while avoiding any interference with efficient and productive activities by American companies.

I. IMPROVING REMEDIES

1. Redress for consumers.—Under current law, the Justice Department cannot bring an action to recover damages to consumers injured by antitrust violations. While the courts have not clearly stated the authority of the Federal Trade Commission to bring such a suit, its authorization to do so is doubtful. The bill allows both agencies to sue for treble damages to consumers.

This is an extension of the current law which allows State attorneys general to sue on behalf of consumers in the State. It is important to allow Federal antitrust agencies this same authority to deal with very large cases that affect people in many States.

The bill also allows suits on behalf of consumers injured through "indirect" purchasers. Under the Supereme Court's Illinois Brick decision, someone who pays higher prices because of price-fixing cannot sue unless he or she buys directly from the parties to the conspiracy. For example, consumers could not sue for pricefixing by all the major automobile manufacturers. This provision eliminates that prohibition for suits by the FTC, the Justice Department, and the State attorneys general.

In order to avoid duplicate recovery, the bill requires that any claim for indirect purchases be made either by intervening in a pending suit by a direct purchaser, or by filing a suit in which direct purchasers are allowed to intervene. If the parens patriae suit is filed on behalf of indirect purchasers, the Government must give reasonable public notice to persons who potentially can file damages for injury from direct purchases. If the direct purchaser initiates a suit, the Government must file a request to intervene within 6 months in order to pursue a claim for direct purchases.

In any case where the government has filed a claim for indirect purchases, the defendant may raise a defense in a direct purchaser suit that the direct purchaser has "passed on" his damages.

2. Effectiveness of divestitures.—The Federal antitrust agencies have increasingly relied on partial divestitures to cure the harmful effects on anticompetitive mergers. While the justice Department says it is preferable for required divestitures to take place before the merger occurs, in practice the FTC and Justice have resolved merger cases by allowing divestitures months or even years after the merger takes place. For example, in the Texaco-Getty merger, the FTC approved the merger before acceptable divestitures of a refinery and retail stations were approved. In both cases, there were serious questions about whether a satisfactory divestiture could be arranged. The bill provides that no merger order involving divestitures is final until satisfactory divestitures have been arranged and approved by the Commission or the court.

In addition, the bill requires that divestitures fully restore lost competition by finding a viable buyer who will be as significant a competitor as the merged firm. For example, in the proposed Norfolk-Southern-Conrail merger, the Justice Department has approved a divestiture plan in which less than half of the competitive problem has been resolved. In the case of the LTV-Republic merger, the Department approved the sale of a plant in Masillon, OH, which closed within 2 years of the merger.

Finally, the bill requires that the antitrust agencies consider employees' interests in approving partial divestitures, consistent with the preservation of competition.

3. Treble damages for the United States.—Under current law, the United States can recover only actual damages in suits for injury to the Government itself. This provision allows the United States to recover treble damages as a plaintiff in its own behalf.

4. Divestiture remedy in private cases.—Section 16 of the Clayton Act provides that private plaintiffs may sue for "injunctive relief" for violations of the antitrust laws. A number of courts have properly concluded that section 16 authorizes the courts to order divestitures in appropriate cases brought by private parties.

In a questionable opinion in 1976, the ninth circuit distinguished between "injunctive relief" and the equitable remedy of dissolution to conclude that the remedy of divestiture is not available to private plaintiffs in an action challenging a merger. However, because of the importance of this remedy, and in order to avoid any further certainty and litigation, the bill makes clear that this remedy is available.

5. Interest awards to injured parties.—Under current law plaintiffs in antitrust cases can obtain interest on damage awards from the time of the judgment. However, the violation and the damage caused by it occur long before the case is won. This provision recognizes that the plaintiff should receive interest dating from the time of the loss. This provision will more fairly compensate injured parties and encourage the speedy resolution of cases by ending the incentive for delay.

II. COST REDUCTIONS AND FOREIGN COMPETITION

The problem American firms face in foreign competition is not their small size. American companies are the largest in the world in automobiles, steel, electronics and textiles and among the largest in shoes. Japan, with a domestic market less than half the United States has 9 companies that manufacture automobiles and over 30 companies that make steel.

Allowing firms to merge in order to meet foreign competition only makes sense if the merger will reduce costs and allow the firm to lower its prices. Otherwise, the merged companies will be even less competitive. A recent study by Federal Trade Commission economists concluded that: "A policy liberalizing the antitrust laws specifically for declining industries would be ill-advised. Such a move would open the way for anticompetitive mergers for which there is no efficiency justification. Some have argued that such a liberalization might be justified to save jobs in areas hard hit by declining employment/ and or to improve the balance of trade. However, there is no persuasive reason to believe that the mergers that would be allowed under the liberalization in question would increase employment or improve the trade balance. Indeed, anticompetitive mergers that do not improve efficiency could reduce U.S. employment and U.S. firms' ability to compete with foreign firms as domestic prices rise and output falls. As a result, changes in merger policy that allow anticompetitive mergers are not a solution to the problem of industrial decline." (Frankena and Pautler, "Antitrust Policy for Declining Industries," FTC, October 1985.)

Because the real question is whether a merger will allow a firm to reduce costs and prices, the bill provides for consideration of possible cost reductions from proposed mergers.

The bill provides that the Federal Trade Commission shall develop rules for companies to furnish specified information regarding any claims that the proposed merger will reduce costs. The information is limited to cost reductions involving production, distribution and transportation, and in exceptional cases, other factors. In all cases, the information to be considered must relate directly to the operations of the firm and cannot extend to reductions which are not real savings in resources such as tax savings. Claims of more efficient management, savings in overhead and administrative expenses, better relations with employees and the like would almost always be too speculative to be considered.

The bill requires that the FTC and the Justice Department take into account reliable evidence that mergers will substantially reduce costs in these specified areas. If the antitrust agencies decline to bring a case based on these considerations, they must certify that the parties have shown by clear and convincing evidence that (1) the merger will substantially reduce costs in one or more of these areas (2) the cost reductions are likely to outweigh any decrease in competition and result in lower prices and (3) there are no reasonable alternatives for achieving these cost reductions. This certification is relevant in a suit by another person challenging the merger.

Foreign competition should be considered in some cases in evaluating the impact of a merger in the United States but only if foreign imports can really make a difference in preventing harm to competition.

The bill requires that the courts consider the impact of foreign competition to the extent it can be shown there is a substantial likelihood that increased foreign sales in the United States will significantly offset any reduction in competition. In some cases, companies have argued that all production in the world should be considered even if only a small portion is exported to the United States. In other cases, companies have argued that increased foreign competition will offset any increase in competition even though additional imports are blocked by quotas or other trade barriers or it is unrealistic to expect that significant additional imports will result from a price increase in the United States. The intent of this provision is to preclude speculation as to increased foreign imports and to require that there be a substantial likelihood that they will substantially offset any harm to competition before they can be considered.

III. STRENGTHENING ENFORCEMENT

1. Time for review of mergers.—The bill provides for a longer period of review under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act for mergers over $1 billion in value. Currently, the antitrust agencies can be forced to review a large, complex merger transaction in as little as 25 days. The bill provides at least 90 days for review of large proposed mergers and allows an equal review period for cash tender offers and other acquisitions. As is the case under current law, the antitrust agencies can shorten this waiting period in individual cases.

2. Access to information for State attorneys general.—The bill allows State attorneys general to have access to information filed by proposed merging companies pursuant to the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act. Prior to 1984, the policy of the Federal Trade Commission had been to release this information to State AG's for use in connection with law enforcement proceedings. However, in 1984 the FTC by a 3 to 2 decision interpreted its statute to mean that it did not have this authority. Several States sued the FTC to reverse this ruling. The FTC decision was upheld by the courts in large part because of deference to the FTC in interpreting its own statute. Consequently, several State AG's who wished to review information regarding a number of proposed mergers were denied access to it.

The bill would ensure that State AG's could have access to this information upon a certification that it would be kept confidential, subject to the need to use it for law enforcement actions and to file comments regarding the adequacy of consent agreements and consent decrees proposed by the Commission or the Attorney General. This provision would aid State attorneys general in bringing their own enforcement actions as well as enable them to participate meaningfully in commenting on FTC and Justice Department merger cases.

By Mr. LEVIN (for himself, Mr. DURENBERGER, and Mr. RUDMAN):

S. 2023. A bill to provide for the establishment of a file concerning the review or rules by the President, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

RULE MAKING INFORMATION ACT

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, today I am introducing, along with Senator DURENBERGER and Senator RUDMAN a bill to bring accountability into the regulatory review process conducted by OMB and established by President Reagan in two Executive Orders 12291 and 12498.

The concept for public disclosure contained in this bill is not new. It was addressed in S. 1080, the omnibus regulatory reform bill passed unanimously by the 97th Congress on March 24, 1982; it was addressed in the reauthorization of the Paperwork Reduction Act passed unanimously by the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee in the 98th Congress on July 26, 1984; and it has been publicly endorsed in part by OMB officials involved in the regulatory review process over the past several years. It has not, however, been put into effect, and that is why we are here today introducing a bill containing basic "sunshine in government" provisions for the OMB review process, which should have been implemented over 5 years ago. We are having to mandate by legislation, what OMB and the President should have had the good sense to do administratively many years ago. But that fact does not make this bill any less important. In fact, it is vitally significant to well established and congressionally intended principles of public participation in the rulemaking process.

Let me take a minute before I elaborate on the problems concerning the lack of public participation in OMB's review of rules, to provide a brief background on just what review process this bill addresses, for those who may be unfamiliar with it.

On February 17, 1981, President Reagan issued Executive Order 12291, which required all covered agencies—that included all executive branch agencies, but not the independent regulatory agencies—to submit their proposed and final rules to OMB for review prior to publication. It directed OMB to review the rules for compliance with five principles layed out in the Executive order. For the record, these five principles are:

(a) Administrative decisions shall be on adequate information concerning the need for and consequences of proposed government action;

(b) Regulatory action shall not be undertaken unless the potential benefits to society for the regulation outweigh the potential costs to society;

(c) Regulatory objectives shall be chosen to maximize the net benefits to society;

(d) Among alternative approaches to any given regulatory objective, the alternative involving the least net cost to society shall be chosen; and

(e) Agencies shall set regulatory priorities with the aim of maximizing the aggregate net benefits to society, taking into account the condition of the particular industries affected by regulations, the condition of the national economy, and other regulatory actions contemplated for the future.

The order set a timetable for OMB review of 10 days for proposed and final nonmajor rules, 60 days for proposed major rules, and 30 days for final major rules. Implicit in the order, however, is the understanding that these timeframes are not inviolate and can be extended indefinitely by OMB. In short, OMB can delay the publication or implementation of a rule indefinitely under Executive Order 12291, if it sees fit, but arguably only if one of the standards in the order is not met. That's strong medicine and an unprecedented role for the management side of OMB.

Now, I should add, here, that my description of the operation of Executive Order 12291, would not coincide with that of OMB. It maintains to my utter amazement, in documents filed in court cases challenging the authority of OMB to hold up rules, that its role is limited to that of an adviser, that the agency head retains the legal authority to draft and issue rules, and that OMB only offers advice. The consequences, it says, to an agency's failure to follow OMB's advice is not legal in nature, but political—that is the possible loss of a job by the responsible agency personnel. So, OMB maintains, it is not the ogre in the rulemaking process; it is merely the consultant.

Well, this consultant has developed a remarkable track record for getting its ideas accepted. Following this fiction created by OMB, on OMB's "advice," agencies, such as the EPA and OSHA have delayed numerous rules beyond the time periods specified in the order and many indefinitely. Senator DURENBERGER, chairman of the Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee of the Governmental Affairs Committee, will be chairing a hearing on next month at which testimony will be presented citing several examples of the strength of OMB's ability to "consult" with these rulemaking agencies. The House Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations of the Committee on Energy and Commerce held a lengthy hearing and conducted an extensive investigation into the example of OMB's involvement in EPA's asbestos regulations. Numerous court cases have been filed, the discovery portion of which has disclosed OMB's heavy hand.

Many highly experienced persons in the field of regulation have called for the elimination of the OMB review process. They argue that the OMB has no legitimate role in reviewing many of the highly complex, unique and exhaustively developed rules agencies are required to send OMB for review. They point out that OMB simply does not have the technical expertise to intelligently comment on, much the less attempt to dictate the outcome of, the thousands of rules which are now required to be reviewed. I have not yet reached that conclusion. I am not uncomfortable with a President having a direct role in the rulemaking process, because I value the political accountability that brings to the rulemaking process. I think the public should be able to go to its President and seek relief from, or the benefits of, agency regulation and know that he or she is in charge. Because it is the President, here in the form of OMB, who is truly responsible for the rules that are being reviewed under the Executive order. President Reagan, in signing that order, has decided to take the heat, and well he should, for the outcome of his agencies' rules.

But, and this is the big but, OMB and the President cannot have it both ways—or at least we should not let them have it both ways. They cannot, on the one hand, seek and obtain the power to shape the rules being issued and on the other hand, obfuscate the extent of their role and the basis for the changes they demanded. When I read the documents filed by OMB and the Justice Department in the lawsuit involving the EPA regulations for the underground storage of hazardous waste, I am shocked. Here OMB and the Justice Department are openly talking out of two sides of their mouths and are not shy about it. To the agencies, they say, "You follow the Executive order and the "comments" of OMB or your job is at risk." To the court they say, "Any agency head is free and has the lawful responsibility to issue the agency rule in whatever form the agency head deems advisable. OMB's comments are not legally binding. The responsibility lies with the agency head." That's cute. It's much like the older brother who intimidates his younger brother into throwing the rock through the garage window and then when the moment of reckoning comes, he is silent in his support of his brother and refuses to acknowledge any part he played in the matter. When his little brother explains to their parents his older brother's threats, the older brother says, "Yeah, but, it was his decision." That type of conduct is shameful, but it is exactly what OMB is doing. It acts with the iron hand, and then lets the agencies turn slowly in the wind to meet the repercussions and defend the OMB-imposed actions.

Well, this bill will eliminate that inequity and that problem. Because by requiring the extent of OMB's involvement to be in the public record, OMB itself will be responsible for its own actions and will not be able to hide behind the agency and escape public scrutiny. Moreover, the Congress and the public will know exactly the extent to which OMB affected the outcome of the rule and the basis upon which OMB argued for its position. No longer will it be a guessing game. Finally, but no less importantly, the public will know whom it should be lobbying on specific issues, because it will know from which agency the criticisms of the rule are coming.

Those who have followed this issue for the last 5 years will note that we have added one part to this bill which was not included in previous discussions of the disclosure provisions. And that is a limitation on the amount of time OMB can have to review a rule. There is ample evidence that OMB—on rules of some importance—is exceeding the timeframe established by the Executive order. And once exceeded, the time for review can become almost unlimited. Senator DURENBERGER and I have agreed that OMB's opportunity for review should be limited as well as a public one, and in establishing a strict timeframe, we are reestablishing the authority of the agency head to make a timely decision. The Senate unanimously passed this provision, too, when it passed S. 1080 in the 97th Congress, since S. 1080 contained a comparable provision.

This bill also addresses the disclosure issues that have arisen pursuant to Executive Order 12498. That Executive order was issued by President Reagan on January 4, 1985. It regularized what those in the rulemaking field had come to understand—that OMB's role in an agency rulemaking is not limited to the review period specified in Executive Order 12291, the proposed and final rule. OMB's role begins—or at least OMB tries to initiate its role—when the agency first contemplates the development of a rule. Executive Order 12498 requires rulemaking agencies—but for the independent regulatory commissions—to develop regulatory agendas; that is, a yearly plan of rules to be developed or worked on, and to submit a draft of that plan to OMB for review. OMB is then in the position to add to and subtract from that regulatory plan. Once OMB has reviewed the regulatory plan and obtained agency compliance with its "recommendations," the agency must then submit a final regulatory plan, which is then combined by OMB with the plans of other agencies, and embodied in the final overall regulatory plan for the executive branch.

For many rules, inclusion in or exclusion from the regulatory plan can be the entire ball game, so to speak. Yet, these draft regulatory plans are not available to the public for comment. This bill would change that. It would require the rulemaking agency to make its draft regulatory plan available to the public at the time it is submitted to OMB. The same would be true for the final regulatory plan. This would enable the public to weigh in with their opinions about the pros and cons of conducting certain rulemakings and to track OMB's role in determining the agency's rulemaking agendas.

The fact that OMB has worked so hard over the past 5 years to keep its role in the rulemaking process hidden from the public. Congress, and the courts, has undermined the public's confidence in the rulemaking process and violated the essence of the Administrative Procedure Act passed by Congress in 1946. In passing that act, Congress made a clear statement that agency rulemaking was to be public matter, with public participation. OMB, through its diligence in obfuscating its role, has undermined those congressionally established principles.

And so we come to the substance of the bill we are introducing today. The Rulemaking Information Act of 1976 would do the following:

SUMMARY OF RULE MAKING INFORMATION ACT OF 1986

Requires each rulemaking agency to establish a file at the time the agency takes any action to consider whether to initiate a rulemaking.

The agency must include in that file:

Any written material it receives, including any written material from OMB;

Any written material it submits to OMB, including any draft of a proposed or final rule;

A description of any substantive change the agency made in a proposed or final rule because of OMB's comment and an explanation of the specific reasons for such change.

Requires OMB personnel who have contacts with outside parties about a rulemaking to make a record of such contacts, if the contacts form a basis for making a recommendation to the rulemaking agency, and forward such record to the rulemaking agency;

Requires that the agency place the record of OMB contacts in the public file.

Requires that the agency make the file available to the public at the time the rule is published in the Federal Register as proposed.

Requires the agency on an annual basis to publish in the Federal Register a list of those rules that were sent to OMB for review but which were never published as proposed.

Requires the agency to maintain a file which records the dates on which proposed and final rules are sent to OMB for review and the dates on which such rules are returned to the agency by OMB.

Requires each agency to make available to the public the draft and final regulatory programs required to be submitted by the agency to OMB pursuant to Executive Order 12498.

Limits the period for review by OMB to 30 days for proposed and final rules, with the opportunity for an additional 30 day extension for good cause.

The Senate spoke unanimously in 1982 in support of disclosure provisions similar to the ones contained in the bill we are introducing today. OMB has had ample time to implement such requirements administratively but has steadfastly refused to significantly move in that direction. We are in the position of having to mandate what should already have been done voluntarily in the name of good government. It is my hope that we can have early hearings on this bill in the Governmental Affairs Committee and obtain swift passage of this legislation in the Senate this spring. My friends and colleagues, it is a bill whose time has not only come, but is long overdue.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in full following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2023

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today I rise to join my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan, to express my strong support for this bill. S. 2023 is intended to safeguard Congress and the public's right to know what factors an agency considers when it promulgates rules. That Congress enjoys this right is undeniable. The privilege of rulemaking power is conferred upon agencies by Congress in order to provide administrative flexibility in the face of technological and scientific complexity. And, Congress saw fit to protect the public's basic right to know when it enacted the Administrative Procedure Act in 1946.

Both of these rights are now endangered because Congress has failed to effectively counter OMB's growing power to change the course of regulatory policy as it sees fit under procedural authorities created by Executive order.

Some regard OMB's exercise of these powers as unconstitutional. I do not share that view. As chairman of the Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee, which is charged with responsibility for overseeing the regulatory process generally and OMB's exercise of its responsibilities particulary, I believe that we need a watchdog on excessive regulatory costs and intrusive regulatory strategies. I believe it is appropriate for the President to play this role. One reason we need an institutional voice for economy in rulemaking is that while the Federal Government creates the regulatory programs, it's not the Federal Government that pays most of their costs. So there is little incentive in Washington to take a hard look at them. Most regulatory costs aren't reflected in the Federal budget: they are hidden in expenses paid by businesses, State and local governments, and in the prices consumers pay for goods and services. While the costs are shifted and spread out across the economy, they mount up. By one 1980 estimate, if the Federal Government had to write a check for the sum total of all the regulatory programs it was responsible for, that check would have been for over $100 billion in 1980 alone.

One hundred billion dollars. That's a big check. We ought to be sure that we're not paying for more than we need. No more regulatory overkill. We ought to be sure that what we're getting is worth what we're paying for. No more getting taken for a regulatory ride.

Given OMB's analogous role in budget decisions who better than it to act as a voice for holding down regulatory costs? But, OMB's power should not be exercised in secret and it should not be unilateral. For one thing, OMB cannot substitute for agency expertise because the voices of scientific and technical understanding are not those of budget examiners, economists or management specialists. For another, Congress, should not have to count on OMB to act as its interpreter when in comes time to decide the meaning of a particular statute or provision. We do not need OMB's voice to substitute for our own. Nor can the views of the public be represented by OMB, at least not those of the people regulation seeks to protect.

Those who believe as I do that Government runs best when its institutions are open—when everyone, not just a select few, is allowed to play his or her part—should support this legislation.

There are those who believe this bill does not go far enough. Under the logic that you can't get too much of a good thing some say we should pull the doors wide open on the OMB regulatory review process. We should make OMB and the agencies log every call, summarize every exchange, and keep it all open and on the record as it happens. The fact is that taking disclousre to the extreme will do more harm than good. This bill is not intended to bury agencies and OMB in paperwork. Nor is it intended to squelch free and candid discussion by executive branch personnel and the President's staff.

Instead, it recognizes that OMB review has fundamentally altered the process of agency rulemaking. It allows that process to continue, but at the same time it builds in protections so that Congress' delegation of rulemaking authority is not abused nor its legislative intentions subverted. And, so that the spirit of the Administrative Procedure Act—the law which has protected the public's right to participate in rulemaking since 1946—is not trampled in the quest for more cost efficient, less intrusive regulatory policies.

How would it do that? It requires the agency to establish a rulemaking file at the time it considers whether or not to initiate rulemaking, earlier than currently required under the Administrative Procedure Act, but in keeping with the current realities imposed by the new Office of Management and Budget process.

What would go in the file? Less than some might hope, more than others might like. It would include a copy of any written material received by the rulemaking agency pertaining to rulemaking, a copy of any written material—including drafts of proposed and final rules submitted to OMB—and a description of any changes made in the substance of the rule as a result of the OMB review process, the reasons for making the change, as well as a copy of any summaries of conversations provided the agency by OMB. Under this bill, neither the agency nor OMB is required to document every conversation or every editorial correction, only those few that made a substantive difference. This bill does not envision a paperwork nightmare, and it should not create one.

When would the file be available to the public? Only when the rule is published in the Federal Register. This seems necessary to protect the right of the OMB and the agency to a free and candid exchange of views as to the rule.

What about those rules that are proposed by the agency but are withdrawn as a result of the regulatory review process? How can the public's right and the Congress' need for this kind of information be systematically and routinely made available? This bill would require within 30 days of the end of each calendar year agencies to publish a list of rules which it forwarded to OMB for review but which were not published in the Federal Register. And, the agency will be required to keep log when it sends a rule to OMB, and when that rule is returned.

Finally, what about the new, and potentially farsweeping, regulatory planning process created by Executive Order No. 12498? In the first year of the program, OMB allowed agencies to make their draft proposed programs, the ones sent to OMB, available to the public. As far as I can see, no earthshaking negative consequences befell the executive branch as a result of letting some sun shine in on this process. It should continue. If this bill is enacted, it will. Each agency is required to make available to the public a copy of any draft or final regulatory program submitted by the agency to OMB for review. Notice of the availability of these programs is to be given in the Federal Register within 15 days after they are submitted.

If the race toward regulatory reform goes to the swift, then there is no doubt that the President would win it. The OMB regulatory review process is one of a number of powerful tools the President is using to change the course of regulatory policy through administrative means. But what can be done quickly by the President alone, without a firm basis in the law, can be undone just as quickly by the stroke of another President's pen. For those of us who believe in real regulatory reform, that's just not good enough. We in Congress cannot, we must not, short cut the regulatory policy process by abdicating our responsibility to participate in regulatory policymaking. Nor should we give away the public's right to our rush to cut the costs of Federal regulation.●

PROCEEDING BY THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

SEC. 303. (a) Within ten years after the date of consummation of the sale of the interest of the United States in the common stock of Conrail to Norfolk Southern Corporation, any railroad which—

(1) had rail operating revenues of less than $1 billion in calendar year 1985; and

(2) alleges that it has been injured by diversion of traffic from its lines as a result of the acquisition of Conrail by Norfolk Southern Corporation and the exercise of market power by the consolidated Norfolk Southern Corporation and Conrail system (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "consolidated system"), may petition the Interstate Commerce Commission to institute a proceeding under this section.

(b)(1) The Commission shall commence a proceeding under this section, if the Commission finds that such railroad, as a result of the exercise of market power by the consolidated system, has experienced—

(A) a diversion of traffic from its lines equal to or greater than three and one half percent of the number of carloads handled by such railroad during calendar year 1985; or

(B) a rerouting of traffic that has resulted in a loss of revenues from such traffic that is equal to or greater than three and one-half percent of the total railway operating revenues of such railroad in calendar year 1985.

(2) For purposes of this subsection, Norfolk Southern Corporation shall be required to establish by clear and convincing evidence that such diversions have occurred because of superior service and efficiency on the route to which the traffic is diverted. In the absence of such evidence, the Commission shall presume that the diversions occurred as a result of the exercise of market power by the consolidated system.

(c) In any such proceeding, the Commission shall determine what additional divestitures or conditions are necessary to eliminate the market power of the consolidated system in each major rail market served by the consolidated system, and to provide to such railroad fully competitive alternative connecting service to each such major rail market. The Commission shall issue an order directing that such divestitures be completed and that such conditions be imposed. In determining whether the consolidated system has market power in any major rail market, the Commission shall accord substantial weight to merger guidelines issued by the Department of Justice.

(d) Divestitures ordered to be completed under this section shall be made at a price agreed upon by Norfolk Southern Corporation and the purchaser. If Norfolk Southern Corporation and the purchaser are unable to agree on such a price, the Commission shall fix a price for the divestiture which shall not reflect any value of the line to be divested that is attributable to the market power of the consolidated system in any rail market.

(e) The Commission shall issue a final order in any such proceeding within one year after the date of filing of a petition under subsection (a) of this section.

(f) Any order issued under this section shall be subject to judicial review in the same manner and to the same extent as orders issued by the Commission under chapter 113 of title 49, United States Code. Any divestiture ordered to be completed, or condition imposed, by the Commission under this section shall be deemed to be approved by the Commission under such chapter 113.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

DURENBERGER VS. CASEY

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today to enter into the RECORD an article from the Christian Science Monitor. The article sets the record straight concerning a flap between my good friend and colleague from Minnesota, DAVE DURENBERGER, and CIA Director Bill Casey, fought on the front pages of the Washington Post.

Senators may recall, late in the last session, a front page article in the Post in which DAVE appeared to be leveling some major league criticisms at Casey and his handling of the CIA. That article then engendered a Casey response, again on page 1.

As it turns out, the squabble was really a creation of the Washington Post. As the article I am submitting indicates, the Post took out of context and sensationalized a few remarks DAVE made over a long luncheon with several reporters in which the general tenor of DAVE's comments were really very positive about Casey and the Agency. DAVE praised Casey for his professionalism and called him "as good a DCI [Director of Central Intelligence] as we have had in a long time." Nevertheless, it was a couple of criticisms that DAVE made over a long lunch in response to reporters' questions that the Post put on page 1, setting off a public—and needless—dispute that served no one's interests, except possibly the Post's.

I believe each of us ought to read the true story of what DAVE said and then ponder a bit about the influence and power of the media.

I ask that the article from the Christian Science Monitor be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Dec. 3, 1985]

DURENBERGER VS. CASEY

(By Godfrey Sperling Jr.)

The other day Sen. David F. Durenberger (R) of Minnesota, chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence, discussed at some length the Central Intelligence Agency and its director, William J. Casey, with a group of reporters over lunch.

The next morning the Washington Post's Page 1 headline read: "CIA, Casey Criticized by Hill Chairman." And the lead paragraph said that Mr. Durenberger criticized Mr. Casey "for lacking a 'sense of direction' and particularly for failure to understand the Soviet Union.

Yet Durenberger and several of the reporters who attended that luncheon thought that the Post's caption beneath the senator's picture on Page 3, where the article was continued, caught his basic view of Casey. It read, "[Durenberger] defends Casey as 'Professional'."

These reporters all thought that Durenberger's criticism of and reservations about Casey came within a context of an overall appreciation of Casey and the job he was doing. They said they believed that a positive lead (and headline), reflecting Durenberger's defense of Casey, would have accurately mirrored the thrust of the senator's comments on the intelligence director.

The Post's story set off an explosion, at least in the pages of that influential newspaper. Casey, responding to the story, fired off a public letter, asking at one point, "What are [CIA officers around the world] to think when the chairman of the Senate Select Committee offhandedly, publicly, and inaccurately disparages their work?"

Casey might have held his fire if he had been aware of this response by Durenberger at the luncheon to the question "Do you have any doubts about the leadership of the CIA?"

"Not yet," he said. "I think Bill is as good a DCI [director of central intelligence] as we have had in a long time. That forgives a whole lot of things by saying that.

[Chuckling.] "And you would have an 8-to-7 vote on the committee if I put it to a vote." Continuing:

"Bills' problems are still more style and perception than they are substance. I think as a substantive professional politician he is just a darn good guy in that job. When he gets them into trouble by, say, shutting down information to the Congress or something like that, it's because they can't be trusted.

"There is a professionalism in Bill. He knows the craft. He knows something of the politics involved in it. He knows about the relationship between information and intelligence and between intelligence and public policy."

Later on in the lunch, Durenberger said he would give Casey a plus for his job performance. Then he expressed this reservation: "One of the things we [the committee] will be sorting out is whether . . . [national-security adviser Robert] McFarlane shouldn't be the President's right hand on the intelligence input into policy and Casey ought to be the pro who runs the organization.

The next day the Post ran a Page 1 article in which Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democrat on the committee, said he believed that Casey wanted to go back to the days when there was no congressional oversight of CIA covert operations.

And the day after, the Post on its Sunday Op-Ed page printed, side by side, the Casey letter and a responding letter from Durenberger in which the senator defended congressional oversight and public discussion of the CIA. What developed here was a yelling contest between Durenberger and Casey that probably would not have occurred if Casey had heard the carefully and quietly uttered Durenberger assessment of him at the lunch.

The Post's ombudsman, Sam Zagoria, followed up a few days later with his own carefully researched appraisal of these stories and public exchanges in his column on his newspaper's opinion page.

"[The Post's] report could not be supported by snips and snaps in the transcript," he wrote, "but Senator Durenberger's string of compliments for Mr. Casey and the vagueness of his suggestions for possible change by the end of 1986 should have discouraged treating the story so one-sidedly."

"Leads and headlines have a tendency to simplify and polarize positions." Mr. Zagoria added, "and this happened here. The result has been a four-day battle in the Post, and I doubt that it was intended by the three public officials. What started out as a low-key discussion about relationships between a key Senator and an agency escalated into a shouting match and some of the most surprised were the Senator and some of his auditors."●

REMEMBERING DR. KING

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, this Nation has just observed the first celebration of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s birthday. It was a time of celebration, a time to reflect on the life of Dr. King and the meaning of his words.

In his famous "I have a dream" speech, Dr. King could have modified and described his dream with any word in his vast vocabulary. I think it is both fitting and insightful that he gave the foundation for his dream a patriotic foundation, when he said "It is rooted in the American dream." So it is with this day of observance—it was and should continue to be an American holiday.

Black Americans are justly proud that America has decided to honor a black person in this manner. However, Dr. King's teachings are such that all Americans can be proud. Proud that the Constitution has been expanded to include every race, both sexes, all nationalities, and every creed. The Constitution which was written almost 200 years ago was not a perfect document but rather a document with perfect potential. Dr. King, the civil rights movement, the ultimate desegregation of America, all served to make our Nation stronger and our Constitution relevant.

On Monday, January 20, 1986, almost every television set and every radio played the words of Dr. King over and over. His full vibrant voice once again reminded us of the dream—sadly, it is a dream that remains unfulfilled for far too many of our citizens.

On this day, Monday, January 27, 1986, the radio stations have gone from hard reality to hard rock, from the eloquent words of Dr. King to the unintelligible lyrics of Twisted Sister, but the impact of Dr. King's life must not be restricted to 1 day's celebration, but rather to a life's commitment. So, although the television stations will now devote their cameras and tape machines to Miami Vice or Dynasty, the image of the man and the movement should inspire each of us to help those less fortunate than ourselves.

There are many people in this great Nation for whom the dream of Dr. King means little. We read the cold statistics and often we are not impressed at all, but behind those statistics are live, warm human beings. Unemployment among minority youth in this country has reached depression levels, fueled in part by the scandalous drop-out rates among black and Hispanic teenagers; 4 of every 10 black youths who begin school will drop out and in some areas the number is even higher for Hispanic youths. It may be true that we are moving forward in our economy, but we are leaving far too many of our young people behind. The business community which by and large supported the King holiday should also support hiring practices and training programs that will enable our youth to gain meaningful work experiences.

In infant mortality, according to every statistic I have seen, black infants are twice as likely to die in their first year as are white infants. Even American white infant death rates supersede many white European rates. The data is startling, the facts are irrefutable. For the unemployed, for dropouts, for young babies "at risk," the dream is a hollow vision. The solutions we seek do not all rest with Government programs. As the ranking member of the Budget Committee, I understand quite clearly the limitations we face from the public sector but public/private partnerships could be extremely helpful. My legislative proposals on infant mortality (S. 1209) and dropouts (S. 1771) are not total solutions—they are only beginning efforts.

The real challenge which faces all Americans is that of making the American dream live for so many who are left out and forgotten. The highest honor we can pay to Dr. King's memory is not simply setting aside a day to remember, but to commit our lives to not forgetting those who need and deserve our help.●

PRESIDENT'S PROLIFE PROCLAMATION

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, for the second year in a row, President Reagan has proclaimed the Sunday preceding the anniversary of the disastrous Roe versus Wade abortion decision, "National Sanctity of Human Life Day." Sunday, January 19, 1986, is that day set aside when we recall how we as individuals, and we as a society, have failed to respect life at every stage of development. National Sanctity of Human Life Day is a day when we are called to pray for the unborn, the newly born, the handicapped and the elderly. It is a day to reflect on the inherent dignity of each human being, and to assist concretely those whose sanctity of life is threatened.

Many institutions have observed National Sanctity of Human Life Day in the past, and more will be doing so in the years to come. The Southern Baptists have placed the day on their official calendar; and over 20,000 primarily Protestant congregations have observed for the third year a day of prayer for the unborn.

The increased recognition and efforts on behalf of the unborn fostered by National Sanctity of Human Life Day are commendable, and long overdue. They presage further, more extensive advances in our struggle to grant unborn children the rights that all human beings enjoy. They also portend observances by a greater number of organizations, and proclamations of even grander scope: For example, the President has before him a request from six U.S. Senators calling for a declaration of 1987 as "The Year of the Unborn."

I applaud all such efforts, and I encourage renewed activity in defense of life.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, on January 22, Ukrainians throughout the world observed the anniversary of Ukrainian independence. Following World War I, the newly established Ukrainian State was recognized by a number of governments including the Russian Federated Soviet Republic. Despite Moscow's pledge to respect the independence of the Ukraine, it soon attacked the young state both militarily and by employing subversion from within. After almost 4 years of war, the Ukraine fell to the forces of Soviet Russia and her eastern neighbors. After losing their short-lived freedom, the Ukrainian people have endured a long period of religious and national persecution and economic exploitation.

In the 1930's, for example, Stalin ordered the liquidation of the Ukrainian autocephalous Orthodox Church. Many bishops and priests were murdered, as were an untolled number of intellectuals. In 1932-33, over 7 million men, women, and children perished in the Soviet Government's intentionally induced famine.

World War II brought more tragedy upon the Ukrainian people. On one side, the fleeing Red troops left behind devastated lands. On the other side, the advancing Nazi armies engaged in looting, sent many on forcible deportations to slave labor camps, and even mass executions. According to reports of the Soviet Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, the Nazi occupation resulted in the extermination of over 5 million people.

After World War II, the suffering did not end. In 1946, the Kremlin destroyed the Ukrainian Catholic Church in western Ukraine by arresting, murdering or deporting many in its hierarchy.

For some time, we have received reports that hundreds of young poets, writers, researchers, and human rights activists have been arrested and sentenced to long imprisonment or confined to psychiatric institutions. According to U.S. Government reports, although Ukrainians account for only 12 percent of the Soviet population, they account for 40 percent of all political prisoners in the Soviet Union.

Although deprived of freedom and suffering great losses, the Ukrainian people have never surrendered nor given up hope of liberation. By recalling their short-lived independence they continue to demonstrate their undying struggle to regain their freedom.

This year, while commemorating Ukrainian independence, we as Americans wish to commend the Ukrainian people for their commitment to the principles of liberty they have so undeniably demonstrated.●

KOREA—SUPPLY SUPPORT ARRANGEMENT

The Government of Korea has requested a Cooperative Logistics Supply Support Arrangement (CLSSA) under a Foreign Military Sales Order II (FMSO II) Blanket Order Requisition for spare parts and supplies to support AT-37, C-123K, F-4, F-5, F-16, and T-33 aircraft and other systems and subsystems of U.S. origin. The estimated cost is $82 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy and national security of the United States by helping to improve the security of a friendly country which has been and continues to be an important force for political stability and economic progress in Eastern Asia.

The Republic of Korea needs these spare parts and supplies to assure that aircraft previously procured from the United States are maintained in a mission capable status. The Korean Air Force will have no difficulty in absorbing these spare parts and supplies.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

Procurement of these items and services will be from the many contractors providing similar items and services to the U.S. armed forces.

Implementation of this sale will not require the assignment of any additional U.S. Government personnel or contractor representatives to Korea.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

MR. KERMIT LYNCH OF BERKELEY

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 27, 1986

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article that was printed last year in the Washington Post regarding the outstanding contribution that a constituent of the Eighth California District has made to the enjoyment of fine wines.

Kermit Lynch, a wine merchant in Berkeley, CA, has pursued the difficult and unenviable job of building a successful business importing European wines into the very heart of the California wine community. His dedication to pursing and convincing small owner-operated wineries in France and Italy to export their excellent wines to the United States has, in the words of the Post, placed him at the top of his profession.

I urge my colleagues to read this article in order to appreciate how one small business operator has merged an appreciation for fine wines with hard work to create a nationally recognized business.

WINE—A FRENCH PASSION

(By Robert M. Parker, Jr.)

It seems ironic and highly unlikely that the man considered by many to be today's finest importer of French wines works out of Berkeley, Calif., in the shadow of the booming wine industry 30 miles to the north in Napa and Sonoma counties.

His name is Kermit Lynch and in the competitive imported-wine business no one has a better reputation for uncompromising quality and impeccable tasting standards. It all started in 1971 when Lynch sold his handicraft business and took off for Europe.

There, he developed an interest in European wines, though his first wine shop, which he opened the next year in Albany, Calif., specialized in hard-to-get California wines such as Joseph Swan and Chalone. He maintained an inventory in those days of only 30 cases and by his own admission struggled for two years to keep afloat in what he has described as "a closet wine shop."

By 1974, his first big opportunity, as well as gamble, occurred. At the time, this country was awash in an ocean of imported wine that was being dumped on the market because speculative deals involving French wines had gone sour.

The great wine crash of '74 occurred largely because large beer and whiskey corporations had misjudged how much consumers would spend for a bottle of bordeaux or burgundy. They had invested heavily in a series of poor vintages, 1972, 1973 and 1974, and when the international oil crises hit they panicked and sold off their huge stocks to a wine-consuming public that was unwilling and financially unable to accept such poor wines.

One of America's premier importers of fine burgundies, the Chateau and Estates Co., in 1974 also decided to dump, at distress sale prices, its line of burgundies selected by the late, great American wine specialist Frank Schoonmaker. Lynch saw the extensive offering of burgundy wines from Chateau and Estates and notice that it included not only mediocre vintages like '73 and '74, but great burgundy vintages such as 1972, 1971 and 1969.

Rather than buy them blindly, Lynch and close friend Joe Swan flew to Burgundy and arranged to taste these selections across the board. The outcome was that Lynch invested everything he had in the best of these wines, and it was these selections that permitted him to build a strong following in California for his expertise in burgundy.

The 1974 trip was followed by yearly trips to France to visit winemakers, taste wines and develop contracts in the vineyards. Lynch gives a great deal of credit to famous author and Provence native Richard Olney, whom he first met in 1976. He claims that Olney helped develop his interest in the better wines of the underregarded Rhône Valley and Provence, two areas that Lynch has exploited extensively. Almost alone, he has been responsible for introducing many Americans to their gems.

Lynch also credits Olney with introducing him to the wines of such legendary Rhône and Provence producers and Chave in Hermitage, Clape in Cornas, Multier in Condrieu and the Peyraud family in Bandol. In the early days of Lynch's career, Olney acted not only as a wine advisor, but also as a translator as Lynch spoke no French, a deficiency he quickly corrected.

By 1978, Lynch had developed a word-of-mouth reputation (he never did and still does not advertise) in the San Francisco Bay area as a top specialist in the Rhône, Provence and Burgundy regions. It was also at this time that Lynch began doing things that other merchants and importers deemed too costly and unorthodox.

Distressed at the changed condition in San Francisco of some of the wines he had selected in France, he became convinced that the exposure of wine to both heat and cold during the 7 to 10 days of a traumatic ocean voyage was robbing his wines of the character they possessed. In 1978, he commenced shipping all of his wines (whether $5 mâcon-villages wines or rare $60 burgundies) in temperature-controlled containers known in the trade as "reefers."

Though it is more expensive, Lynch has maintained that it is the only way to guarantee that "the quality in the barrel ends up as the same quality in the bottled wine." He remains one of a handful of importers who go to this care and expense for their wines.

Another Lynch campaign has been a 10-year battle with producers not to filter or pasteurize their wines. Lynch, a fervent believer in (and even crusader for) natural, unmanipulated wines, has refused to deal with growers who stripped and eviscerated their wines of character and personality by extensive filtration. Just this year, after pre-selling $15,000 in futures of a red burgundy from a famous grower in Gevrey-Chambertin to his clients he refused to accept the wine after learning that the grower "filtered the hell" out of it. Lynch returned the $15,000 to his buyers, saying he would not sell them a mediocre wine. He also stopped buying the wine from this particular grower. In today's world of commercial realities, such actions are unheard of.

The year 1978 was also a watershed for Lynch because he stopped selling California wines in his store. He was criticized by California wineries for not being willing to represent their wines, but he claims the decision was necessary because (1) he did not have room in his small shop, (2) he wanted to select only the best bottlings from each winery and they insisted he purchase the entire line, and (3) he felt that the great majority of California wines had no character, personality or finesse.

Lynch claims that his fanatical dedication to wine quality was also an outgrowth of his respect and admiration for restaurateur Alice Waters of Chez Panisse, who now is a regular buyer of Lynch's burgundy, rhône and provence wines for her famous restaurant in Berkeley.

Lynch remembers visiting Waters one day and seeing her throw 100 heads of lettuce into the garbage because they were "not quite fresh enough." Lynch is known to pay an extra premium for special lots of wine from growers in France to get only the wine made from old vines or from special hillside vineyards. Like Waters, he spares no expense in trying to deliver a product in its most dramatic and natural form.

Lynch's fame and expertise has spread throughout America. His top wines, ones he used to have to beg clients to try, are now on strict allocation.

Six months ago he went national and his wines are now represented throughout the country by Chalone Imports, a national importer based in San Francisco.

Even if you can not get a bottle of Lynch's most exquisite rhône or burgundy wine, you can get on his mailing list to receive his free, well-written, often-poetic wine newsletter (write to Kermit Lynch, Wine Merchant, 1605 San Pablo Ave., Berkeley, Calif. 94702).

A SALUTE TO FRANK DeRUGIERO

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 27, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, for 13 years Mr. Frank DeRugiero served as the custodian at the Morristown, N.J. Post Office wherein is located one of my district offices.

Frank's meticulous and dedicated work to the building and for its tenants earned him an outstanding reputation throughout the greater Morristown community. Constituents, my staff, and I benefitted from countless conveniences made possible by Frank. On this occasion of his retirement, I wish Frank all the best for the future. The following article from the Daily Record provides a testament of Frank's commitment to people. The article follows:

FORMER POSTAL EMPLOYEE TAKES ON NEW JOB AT 72

(By Joe Malinconico)

MORRISTOWN.—Most people first came to know Frank DeRugiero at his Speedwell Avenue barber ship, where they spent hours "shooting the breeze" amid the strong smell of hair tonic and warmth from an old black stove.

But after 25 years, as the rent increased along with the length of the latest hairstyles, it became difficult to pay the bills. DeRugiero closed shop to take a better-paying job as a custodian at the Post Office, where a new generation grew to know the hard-working man who manicured the building's lawn as carefully as he clipped his customers' hair.

Then 13 more years passed, and DeRugiero, now 72, could feel his age each time he bent down to a pull a weed.

"There comes a time when you have to pack it in," he said. "I just couldn't do the work anymore. They wanted me to stay on, but I felt that it wasn't right."

So last week he retired from the Post Office and replaced his janitor's overalls with the bright orange vest and cap he wears as a school crossing guard. The children who pass the corner of Mills Street and Sussex Avenue each day are getting to know the same strong voice and sincere smile that first greeted local residents in the days of the Depression when they would pay a quarter to have their hair trimmed.

Frank DeRugiero doesn't retire, he just moves on to another job.

"It's enough to give me something to do," he said, sitting in the living room of the Ralph Place home he had built in 1954 for $20,000. "It's not that strenuous of a job. And it gives me some spending money."

J. Robert Tracey, the local postmaster, describes DeRugiero as if he were a local landmark.

"Everybody knows Frank," said Tracey, who used to be a customer at his former employee's barber shop," and everybody likes him.

"He would come by on weekends to make sure if all the doors were locked and the windows were closed," he continued. "And he'd always check the boilers so we'd have heat come Monday morning."

Tracey said several other local businesses had asked the Post Office to let DeRugiero help landscape their grounds. His work also won praise from Glenn Coutts, the head of Morristown Beautiful Inc.

"The small grass plot and well-tendered flower garden in front of the Post Office makes a clear statement to the community that someone cares," Coutts wrote in a letter to Tracey.

DeRugiero is at times uncomfortable when asked about his life.

"To tell you the truth, I really don't like this," he said. "I don't like to talk about myself."

But once he drifts off into the past, DeRugiero is at ease, whether he is recalling his days fighting fires with the Civil Conservation Corps in the state of Washington or retelling the story of how he resisted a young mugger who tried to steal a canvas bag filled with $100 worth of coins of the Post Office's money.

His parents came to America from Naples and they soon settled in the former Little Italy section of town on Flager Street. He hawked newspapers on the veranda of the old Washington Hotel and remembers shouting: "Extra Extra Harding dead Coolidge inaugurated." Then there was the hot summer day he sneaked atop the ice wagon to swipe a chunk and ended falling off and getting run over.

"Yep," he paused, "those were the good old days."

He and his wife, Jo, bought their first house in 1945. ("I'll never forget, it was the day President Roosevelt died.") Nine years later they moved to their Ralph Avenue home, just a few blocks from the corner where DeRugiero crosses school children each weekday morning and afternoon.

"I don't know how long I'm going to stay in this job," he says. "I do know it can get cold out there."

AUTO SEATBELTS RATED SAFER THAN AIRBAGS

HON. BOB CARR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 27, 1986

Mr. CARR. Mr. Speaker, with the current high level of interest throughout the country in mandatory seatbelt use laws, I think our colleagues will be interested in the following article from the November 19, Detroit News:

AUTO SEAT BELTS RATED SAFER THAN AIR BAGS

(By John E. Peterson)

WASHINGTON.—Laws requiring motorists to use the lap-and-shoulder belts already on new cars are the fastest, most effective way of reducing the nation's traffic death toll, according to a report by a group of leading scientists.

The report, released by the American Council on Science and Health, said an analysis of crash data compiled by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) showed the lap/belt combination to be 5.5 times more effective in preventing deaths and 2.4 times more effective in preventing injuries than air bags.

The council is made up of more than 100 scientific scholars from such prestigious universities as Harvard, Yale, Minnesota, UCLA, Chicago, Wisconsin, Southern California, Vanderbilt, California at Berkeley and Stanford. The council's advisory board includes four Michigan State University faculty members.

"The evidence to date suggests that air bags will not be as effective as first claimed," said the report, which was authored by council research associate Sharon Campbell.

The report said consumers should be able to purchase air bags as options, but it said they should not be made mandatory equipment on American automobiles because of their current initial costs, replacement costs and doubts about their long-term reliability. Both Ford and Mercedes-Benz will be offering air bags on 1986 models.

While cost estimates for the initial purchase of full-frontal air bag systems ranged from $575 to $828, the report said Mercedes-Benz charged nearly $900 for a driver-side only air bag in 1984. The bags must be replaced after every deployment, the report said, and replacement costs will be two and one-half to three times the initial installation cost, "and thus could be as much as $2,700 per collision. Insurance companies will pick up the tab, so premiums are clearly likely to rise."

The report noted that manually operated seat belts "currently cost only $60 to install and, if they do require replacement . . . will cost only around $75."

The council said results of mandatory belt laws "are encouraging," noting that compliance jumped to 96 percent from 20 percent in France, to 37 percent from 17 percent in Belgium and to 95 percent from 40 percent in Britain after those countries required front-seat occupants to buckle up.

"Proper consistent use of manual belt systems would save some 12,000 lives each year and greatly reduce the injury toll as well," the report concluded.

EASTER SEAL SOCIETY OF ALAMEDA HONORS CLARENCE J. WOODARD

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 27, 1986

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, on January 29, 1986, the Easter Seal Society of Alameda County will hold a testimonial dinner in honor of Clarence J. Woodard. On this occasion, Mr. Woodard will be awarded the "Humanitarian of the Year" award in recognition of his outstanding service to the society and his prodigious contributions of time, talent, and concern on behalf of those less fortunate than himself in the bay area community.

Mr. Woodard is president of Woodard Industries, Inc., and is former chairman of the board of the Rucker Co. He has been active in numerous community activities, including serving on the board of directors of the Jonas Salk Medical Institute and service on the boards of the Boys Clubs of America, the United Way of the Bay Area, the Museum of Modern Art in San Francisco, CA, and many others. He is chairman of the California Foundation for the Retarded, and serves on the board of regents of the distinguished John F. Kennedy University in Orinda, CA.

COMMUNITY MOBILIZATION FOR SMOKING CESSATION PROJECT

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 27, 1986

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to call to the attention of the House of Representatives the National Cancer Institute's [NCI] "Community Mobilization for Smoking Cessation Project." NCI should be applauded for both its research focus and community approach to smoking prevention and cessation in the general population.

NCI has distinguished itself among the National Institute of Health by introduction of research initiatives in black and Hispanic populations where there eixsts a higher incidence of smoking. These large-scale community based smoking prevention and cessation efforts are major stepping stones toward NCI's goal of 50 percent reduction in the cancer rate, and the Surgeon General's goal of wiping out smoking by the year 2000.

Richmond, CA., a city I am privileged to represent, has been chosen as one of the model research sites. Having witnessed the community effort prior to the actual funding, I am delighted to have aid in securing this recognition. The Richmond community's preliminary activities brought together smokers, nonsmokers, public and private sector representatives alike to work on this public health concern.

NCI has now provided the vehicle to assist their efforts and validate their effectiveness with a $2 million grant.

Mr. Speaker, I am honored and privileged that the Seventh Congressional District has become one of the beneficiaries of this partnership. The results will help reduce the increased incidences of cancer, of related illnesses, and of the needless deaths which accompanies smoking. The efforts of our citizens, together with NCI, will serve as a model for other communities which want to provide similar services to their residents.

I also want to call attention to the four leaders of one Richmond project who have come to Washington this week to inaugurate the anti-smoking effort: Enid Hunkeler, project director, Bess Anderson-McNeal, community participation coordinator, Dr. Leonard Syme, principal investigator, and Larry Hill, project coordinator.

A SALUTE TO EDIE HUGGINS

HON. WILLIAM H. GRAY III

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 27, 1986

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives an extraordinary journalist, community leader, and actress—Ms. Edie Huggins.

Ms. Huggins has been a member of Philadelphia's Channel 10 family since January 1966. From her beginning as a featured news reporter on the "Big News Team with John Facenda" to 1971, she anchored and coanchored the news, interviewed scores of personalities and newsmakers, reported countless news stories, and presented memorable investigative series on a variety of subjects.

In addition to her news reporting duties, Ms. Huggins cohosted "What's Happening," a midday news and conversation program from 1972 to 1974; She also hosted "Morningside," a magazine show which featured interviews with politicians and famous people from all fields as well as featured segments on health, homemaking, finance, and entertainment, from 1974 to 1976.

In 1981, Edie Huggins was named to the position of director of community affairs. In that position, she served as station liaison with community groups and civic leaders, organized a speakers bureau, and facilitated meetings between station representatives and community groups.

Presently, Ms. Huggins is hostess and producer for "Horizons," a 1-hour theme program focusing on people and issues in the various communities of Delaware Valley. Topics covered on the broadcast have ranged from education to entertainment—from black history to art history—from prison systems to problems that plague pension programs.

Ms. Huggins also presents a weekly special report called "Talk Back To Ten," which airs during Channel 10 News "Live at Five" broadcast. The segment consists of airing viewers' comments, complaints, and commendations about the station's news broadcasts. She continues to represent the station at various civic, community, and service groups throughout the Delaware Valley.

DAVID S. SPERBER

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 27, 1986

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, on March 2, 1986, David S. Sperber will be honored as "Man of the Year" by Chabad of the Valley for his outstanding contributions to the community.

David Sperber, a well-known attorney in southern California and former deputy attorney general of the State of California, has devoted much of his time to a multitude of civic and humanitarian causes. Among his affiliations are membership to the Lawyers Club, Los Angeles County Bar Association, San Fernando Valley Criminal Bar Association, Federal Criminal Indigent Defense Panel, Los Angeles Trial Lawyers Association, and California trial Lawyers Association.

Mr. Sperber's community activities include participation in the Junior Barristers Parble Aid Program; president of the Board of Trustees of Hear Center; member of the Board of Trustees Hillel Hebrew Academy; associate chairman of the United Jewish Welfare Fund (metropolitan division); member of the City Attorney's Criminal Procedure Committee; cochairman of the Chabad Bar Mitzvah Celebration; chairman of the Legal Committee, Yeshiva University Holocaust Center.

Of Mr. Sperber's many philanthropic and civic activities, the one which has received the lion's share of his attention has been Chabad of the Valley. This organization is the San Fernando Valley branch of the worldwide Lubavitcher movement which is under the leadership of the renowned Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson. The work of Chabad ranges from elementary Jewish education to senior citizen activities. Chabad of the Valley maintains four synagogues, a counseling service, and an extensive outreach program to bring the moral and spiritual values of Judaism to the unaffiliated.

David S. Sperber reflects in his character and community activities the values manifest in the Hebrew acronym which ChaBaD spells—chochma (wisdom), binah (knowledge), and daas (understanding).

I ask the Members to join me in congratulating David S. Sperber, his wife Jeanine Rosemarie, and children, Toby, Elliot, Joshua, and Mara on this special occasion. May the years ahead continue to be filled with happy and meaningful experiences and pursuits.

OAKLAND TECHNICAL HIGH SCHOOL REMEMBERS DR. KING

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 27, 1986

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to share with my colleagues an accomplishment of students at one of America's fine public schools. The school is Oakland Technical High School, and it is the school of which I am an allumni. A group of senior students from Oakland Tech's class of 1985, in a single advanced placement American Government class took on a historical preservation thrust that started in their own front yard.

Through lobbying knowhow gained from the exploits of Tech's class of 1981, whose primary efforts created California's "Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Holiday." These determined students set about gaining landmark status for their school.

At this reading Tech High, whose classic bronze doors were first opened for students in 1915, has been designated as a city of Oakland landmark. This first recognization of their school went along with the students 47 page application to their State historical preservation commission to make Tech both a State landmark and to have it listed in the U.S. Department of the Interior National Register of Historical Places.

The positive impact of the public schools has reached into every community in America. Through the efforts of these preservation oriented students we can anticipate a groundswell of national proportions to designate, in each of our congressional districts, schools and earlier school sites as local/State National landmarks. This is being done by student historical preservation groups in coalition with their own local teachers association. That alliance between students and teachers is being promoted through policy actions started by the Oakland Education Association and expanded upon nationwide by the National Education association at it's annual convention last July in Washington, DC.

The inscription on the face of the California Grey Granite Landmark Monument—that has been sponsored by communtiy, allumni, and Student groups which will be unveiled on "Landmark Dedication Day": February 22, 1986, will read:

When we, with practiced eye, preserve a shining example by the hands and from the souls of an earlier time, we create additional luster in the lives of the yet unborn—Student Landmark Committee

I know that you share in my commendation of these fine young people that personify, so much of what each of us look for in our hopes for America's tomorrow.

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meeting.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, January 28, 1986

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

We ask Your blessing, Almighty God, upon those women and men who respond to the call to public service. Help them to see in their work the opportunity for serving people in ways that promote peace between the nations and encourage freedom and justice for all. In areas where truth is not apparent, give them insight and wisdom to discern the way of righteousness that in all things, we may seek justice, love, mercy, and ever walk humbly with You.

At this moment, O God, let us remember in a moment of silent prayer those who were involved in the space shuttle accident just a few minutes ago off Florida. [Pause.] May Your Spirit be with them and may Your love follow them and their families this day and every day. This we pray. Amen.

EXPRESSING SORROW OF THE HOUSE AT IN-FLIGHT TRAGEDY OF "CHALLENGER" SHUTTLE MISSION 51-L

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 361) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 361

Whereas the House of Representatives has learned with profound sorrow of the first in-flight tragedy of the space program of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, involving the "Challenger" Shuttle Mission 51-L and its crew consisting of Francis R. Scobee (commander), Michael J. Smith (pilot), Judith A. Resnik (mission specialist), Ronald E. McNair (mission specialist), Ellison S. Onizuka (mission specialist), S. Christa McAuliffe (payload specialist), and Gregory Jarvis (payload specialist): Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House expresses its condolences to the families of the crew members of the "Challenger" Shuttle Mission; and be it further

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the families of the "Challenger" crew; and be it further

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes of that time to the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], and pending that I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the brave and dedicated young Americans who this day perished in the unspeakable tragedy witnessed with such trauma and vicariously experienced by millions of people are the very essence of what has made our country great from age to age.

Theirs was the willingness to risk everything they owned and were upon a sublime faith in the skills of thousands of fellow workers, unknown and nameless, in order that our Nation might conquer the next frontier of progress.

Two or three generations ago, a patriot and dreamer wrote a poem which expressed the spirt of the pioneer in every age:

Have I named a single river?
Have I claimed a single acre?
Have I kept a single nugget barring samples?
No, not I.
I have been repaid 10 times over by my Maker,
But you would not understand that
Who go up and occupy.

Surely such was the spirit of Copernicus, of Columbus, and of Gallileo, and such surely is the spirit immortalized today by Francis R. Scobee, Michael J. Smith, Judith Resnik, Ellison S. Onizuka, Ronald E. McNair, Gregory Jarvis, and S. Christa McAuliffe, a schoolteacher from Concord, NH.

In our own time, we have discovered the exhilaration of expanding mankind's field of knowledge and broadening the fields of opportunity for the growing population of a hungry world and to the heretofore trackless voids of space. It is the "New Frontier," and the exploratory beckoning to what Thomas Jefferson called the "illimitable freedom of the human mind."

The poet John Gillespie Magee, Jr., understood that exhilaration, as to a lesser degree have all who have flown and tracked a new frontier and a new place, surely felt and understood by our own beloved colleague, BILL NELSON, who only such short days ago experienced the very same.

He wrote:

Oh, I have slipped the surly bonds of Earth
And danced the skies on laughter-silvered wings;
Sunward I've climbed, and joined the tumbling mirth
Of sun-split clouds . . . and done a hundred things
You have not dreamed of . . . wheeled and soared and swung
High in sunlit silence. Hov'ring there,
I've chased the shouting wind along, and flung
My eager craft through footless halls of air . . .
Up, up the long, delirious, burning blue
I've topped the wind-swept heights with easy grace,
Where never lark, or even eagle flew . . .
And, while with silent, lifting mind I've trod
The high untrespassed sanctity of space,
Put out my hand and touched the face of God.

With hearts heavy in trauma and deeply felt sorrow, the Nation today pays honor and tribute to these brave young Americans and extends its hand to their families and their loved ones and their comrades in such small ways as we can, and in this resolution may we express to all the hopes, the beliefs, the faith and the sympathy which always have underlaid our country.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this is one of those very sad occasions when there is no center aisle, when all the Members who will be privileged to speak in support of the resolution will, in a sense, speak with one voice.

I am reminded of when I was a boy in another age of flight, and before the age of television, when I was gathered around a radio with my parents listening to the landing of the Hindenburg, and then the resultant explosion and burning of that Hindenburg when I was a young man and the feeling that I had at that time. Today, just incidentally, I happened to be listening, watching the monitor again as the shuttle took off, and after liftoff, getting to feel like it was so routine, turned my back and went back to my office when only a few seconds later, I was told by one of the girls in my office of the tragic accident that had taken place. I had that same terrible wrenching feeling down inside that what we had always conceived to be a possibility in this age of space would happen.

We have come to accept these flights as being so routine, and yet it is so highly sophisticated, highly technological in nature that any little thing can go wrong. It reminds me again of how God moves in mysterious ways, I guess from time to time to remind us of what mortal beings we really are and that everything is not all that sure. So much so that our colleague, always feeling so secure and sure that nothing could go wrong, just a few weeks ago took that risk, as did our colleague in the other body.

But I guess in this case it is important that we remind ourselves and the American people that this tragedy, terrible as it is, deserves at least an attempt to discuss it.

The first thing we feel is sorrow, sorrow for the heroic individuals of that tragedy, sorrow for their loved ones, sorrow for our country. But we also feel pride in the seven members of the crew, pride in their dedication, their belief in the space program, in themselves and in our country. And we also feel a sense of resolve, a sense that what they symbolized is too important to be stopped.

Sorrow, pride, a sense of resolve, a human desire to know what happened. These conflicting feeling are with us now, and it is my hope that the American people continue to share the faith that motivated and inspired the crew of the Challenger, a faith that transcends the tragedy, a faith that remembers those who have died while at the same time trying to continue as best we can the work that they are doing.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. FUQUA], chairman of our House Committee on Science and Technology.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished majority leader for yielding and I appreciate his comments and the comments of the distinguished minority leader. Certainly no one took a more personal sadness today in seeing this on television as millions of people were watching.

I just had a chance over the weekend to visit with the entire crew and talk with them, and talk about their mission, and how delighted and thrilled they were to be able to make it.

Of course, at this particular time, we do not have all of the facts and cannot verify the status of the seven members of this crew. We have had 28 years of success in America's Space Program. This is the first time we have had an in-flight accident of this type. I think we can be very proud of our accomplisments and success, and I think all seven members of this crew would also urge that we continue with this very program, seeking new frontiers, and like all new frontiers that involve a certain amount of risk, we must always try to minimize those risks. But we should not let them dissuade our efforts to meet the Nation's space goal with a sense of responsibility and commitment.

Our thoughts and prayers and sympathy go out to their families.

Nineteen years ago and one day, I had a similar sad task, along with my late colleague, Olin Teague, to make the announcement that there was the Apollo fire at Kennedy Space Center which caused the loss of three very distinguished astronauts. I would like to say that the Committee on Science and Technology will conduct a comprehensive investigation into the cause of this accident after the National Aeronautics and Space Administration has completed its immediate investigation. We invite comments from those within and without Government that may have any comments that would be pertinent so that we can try to have a comprehensive report to make to our colleagues in Congress who have been very supportive of this program over the years.

Mr. Speaker, we are all very saddened, a great personal sadness on the part of my wife, Nancy, and I because we have been very great friends of these members of the crew, and our heartfelt sympathy goes out to the members of their families.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. LUJAN], the ranking minority member of the Committee on Science and Technology.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

What a terrible day it is for us. Such a tragedy and we all offer our condolences to the families of these great Americans.

Mr. Speaker, these men and women are truly heroes, pioneers of America in the truest sense of the word.

I was watching the launch in my office, Mr. Speaker, and with me was Dr. William Graham, the Acting Administrator of NASA. We were so pleased, Mr. Speaker, that the weather was fine and we could finally launch.

The initial burn went well, and we saw the roll come off as planned, and then, then, Mr. Speaker, and then the ball of fire, and we knew what that meant: a terrible tragedy.

You keep hoping against hope that there are survivors, but you know there cannot be.

This resolution honors these heroes, these pioneers. You feel so helpless, Mr. Speaker. What can one say? What can one do? We pray for them.

I am stunned by today's tragic explosion of the space shuttle Challenger. This, the 25th launch of the shuttle, promised to be an exciting one with the first non-Government private citizen, Christa McAuliffe, aboard. Christa was to be our first "teacher in space" and with her rode the hopes and dreams of our Nation's young people.

I join my colleagues in mourning the loss of our astronauts and in sharing our grief with their families and friends. This is a day of sadness that we will never foreget.

We will, however, Mr. Speaker, go on with our Space Program. We will pursue our dream to live and work in space, to push back the limits of our knowledge in the vast sea of space. But wherever we go, we will carry in our hearts the memory of those courageous men and women who died today so suddenly and so unexpectedly. God bless them and their families in this tragic hour.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, to the families of my personal friends, Dick Scobee, Mike Smith, Judy Resnik, Ron McNair, El Onizuka, Christa McAuliffe, and Greg Jarvis, Grace and I extend to you our thoughts and prayers, to your families, to your friends at the time of this hour of your loss and our shared grief.

The Space Program has been a marvelous program for America to expand its knowledge, its horizons, and it will continue to be so in the future. As long as man has the thirst for knowledge, we will continue to press outward, and in the process there is risk. That risk is taken by each one of us every day, and that risk is understood by all of the members of the crew that climb into a loaded spaceship.

My concluding remarks would be, as we reflect upon this tragedy, a tragedy that this whole Nation grieves in, let us remember the remarks by someone who knew something about risk, a galliant lady named Helen Keller, when she spoke of risk and security, and this is what she said:

> Security is mostly a superstition. It does not exist in nature, nor do the children of men as a whole experience it. Avoiding the danger is no safer in the long run than outright exposure.

Listen to what she ends with: "Life is either a daring adventure or nothing."

God bless and be with and keep in the palm of His hand our departed brothers and sisters, daring adventurers, and God bless and comfort their families and friends.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, we have today witnessed a terrible tragedy, and this resolution is the Nation saying how shocked and saddened all of America is at the loss.

Those of us intimately involved with our Space Program have known its risks. We know that the men and women who have carried us on to the space frontier are people of great strength of character who are willing to face the dangers unsolved in the Space Program so that our future and the future of our children and their children may be assured. The rewards to mankind and this Nation that exist on that frontier are believed by each of them to be worth the risk. That is why despite tragedy, we must resolve to go on.

But for the moment, our thoughts are with all of those who grieve for loved ones and comrades. We in this body join them in their grief and express our profoundest sorrow on behalf of a nation.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOYER].

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in great sadness and in shock. The tragedy that struck at 11:39 a.m. this morning has stunned us all. In an instant, the incredible energy that we have harnessed broke loose in destruction and devastation occurred.

Among the seven people whom we lost was the first teacher in space, Christa McAuliffe. She was my friend. Her husband, Steve, was a law clerk in my office for 2 years.

She got her master's degree from Bowie State in Prince Georges County. She taught in our school system for 8 years. She now, as you know, Mr. Speaker, teaches in New Hampshire.

Christa was a warm, caring, capable human being. She was accorded the highest honor her country could give her. She was selected to represent her colleagues in one of America's most exciting and important efforts. She embodied, Mr. Speaker, all of the qualities we would hope for in the very best of our teachers.

We had a rally, Mr. Speaker, in August 1985, as the school year was about to begin, and as Christa was about to embark upon here training to prepare herself for this day. She spoke, Mr. Speaker, to some 12,000 members of the Prince Georges County school system, teachers, and support personnel.

I would like to bring to the attention of the House certain of her remarks. She said:

> I see this year as a year of opportunity for education. The Teacher-in-Space Program has already started people looking positively at schools.

She went on to say:

> People have asked me if I plan to return to the classroom next fall. It has been my life for 15 years. I will be at Concord High School in September 1986, because if the teacher-in-space does not return to teaching, something is wrong.

During this year, she said:

> I hope to get students and teachers excited about the future because, after all, this space, this frontier out there belongs to all of us. I hope to help make people aware that teaching is an exciting and necessary profession. I hope to challenge students to reach for the stars.
> I often tell my students we need a relationship based on mutual respect, and the two things that I require of them are two things that I require of myself: that they do the best they can and that they be true to themselves.

She concluded with this in talking to those teachers who were so proud of her and their profession, of which she was so proud, she said: "I touch the future; I teach."

Christa was excited and thankful for the opportunity to be a part of America's effort in space. She believed that it was an important and necessary effort.

As our colleague, BILL NELSON, has so eloquently stated, "It was an effort worth the risk."

I believe that Christa would tell us that today.

We grieve this day, Mr. Speaker, the personal loss of the families of these seven astronauts so representative of the best of humankind.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. PACKARD].

Mr. PACKARD. I thank the Minority Leader.

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, brave men and women have often been called upon to pay the supreme sacrifice for this country. Five men and two women this morning are American heroes when this shuttle blew up in space.

Often in the past there have been—well, not often, but on occasion there has been sacrifice made. In this very program there are those that have made the supreme sacrifice in the past, and there likely will be additional tragedies and sacrifices required in the future. But that ought not to deter us from one of the greatest success stories in American history. This Space Program has never been without risk even though the phenomenal success we have had has led, in many cases, the American people to be complacent with the program.

We almost expect perfection. We do not think of tragedies as we have experienced today. But certainly the risk has always been there and will always be there.

This morning's tragic and terrible and shocking experience has brought us and brought all Americans and, for that matter, all the world to a realization of those risks.

Mr. Speaker, our hearts and our deep sympathies go out to the families and friends of those brave heroes.

The Space Program has been one of America's exciting and most successful programs. It will and must continue.

We must continue to give it the same emphasis and commitment that we have in the past. Obviously, there are many questions to be asked, and this is a time to review and to evaluate the program, to determine if we are moving in the correct direction and if all is well, and if all the security measures are taken.

But certainly this is not a time to make preliminary judgments or to cast doubt on the future of the program. We do not know the facts at this time. We may never know all of them.

Unquestionably, the committees and subcommittees that I serve on will be called upon and will be conducting appropriate hearings and investigations.

Now is the time, however, to pay tribute to those who remain, the loved ones, the families and friends of those who have sacrificed all today.

May God bless you that you may know that God's love is with you. His comfort is with you, and His strength is with you, and that you have given the most valuable gift to America that could be given. Thank you.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHEUER].

Mr. SCHEUER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, we are all in a state of shock this afternoon over the unutterably tragic events of just a few hours ago. All of us across party lines, across the lines of the House and the Senate and the American people, all of us extend our heartfelt condolences to the loved ones of that noble seven, to their families, to their friends, and I think we have to share in the sorrow and understand the sorrow, the traumatic shock of millions and millions of schoolchildren this morning who were watching that television tube live to see their hero, their prototypical teacher, soar into the heavens as part of man's latest advance, breaking down further the barriers of man's knowledge.

The trauma to the millions of schoolchildren of America must be unbelievable. I am sure all of us extend our heartfelt feelings of support and condolence to the kids of America who saw that awful, awful occurrence and will be, in a real sense, traumatized by it.

I think the one thing we can do to dignify the memory of this glorious seven and to give meaning to their lives, to their effort, to their commitment, and to their sacrifice is to follow their trail and continue unflinchingly with the same determination, the same courage, the same grit, the same energy that we showed in further space exploration.

We would be demeaning their memory if our efforts flagged; we would be saying that their sacrifice came to naught. I do not think any of us want that. I think all of us feel that even the fallout that we have enjoyed and benefited from thus far of space exploration justifies space flight, justifies the risk that it always is there.

The advances that have been made and will continue to be made not only in flight itself but in the art of telecommunications, the art of metallurgy, the art of computer sciences, the art of chemical and medicine developments, untold applications to human health, that we have already benefited from more than justify our staying the course and honoring these wonderful, professional, dedicated, committed seven by supporting their efforts, supporting the continuity and the continuation of space flight, both manned and unmanned. I guess that is the best way we can pay them the homage that they deserve and that they merit.

I thank the Speaker.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COUGHLIN].

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, we were horrified, as were all Americans, at the fate of the brave men and women of the shuttle Challenger. Our hearts and our prayers, indeed, do go out to their friends and their families.

Having been associated with the Shuttle Program since its inception as a member of the authorizing committee in 1971 and as a member of the Appropriations Committee for NASA since then, it has been my high honor to have known many of our astronauts personally. All of them have known that there were elements of risks in the program. Yet they have undertaken the exploration of space for the betterment of all mankind.

Mr. Speaker, the safety of flight crews has always been the first priority of NASA, transcending all questions of schedule, of delay, or even of public relations.

The space shuttle as a transportation system involves risks of all transportation systems; yet the program has had immense benefits in communications, in knowledge of the Earth and the universe, in national security, medicine, and even such mundane things as weather forecasting. Despite the tragedy, I have confidence that the program should continue, and I am sure there will still be brave men and women who will carry it forward. Perhaps what they will do will be the greatest tribute that can be paid to the great and brave men and women who today made the ultimate sacrifice for our country and for mankind.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, along with the rest of America and this body, I rise with a heavy heart, one of sadness and one that is hard to explain. To the families of the seven men and women who were lost today, on behalf of this body and the rest of the Nation, I extend sympathy, prayers, and understanding.

But for a moment or two, I would like to call your attention to just one of these seven. His name is Mike Smith. He graduated from the Beaufort, NC, High School, a relatively small rural high school, in 1963. He graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy in 1967 with a bachelor of science degree. He graduated from the Navy Postgraduate School in 1968 with a masters degree in aeronautical engineering. He leaves a wife and three children. He leaves two brothers and a sister.

Now let me just for a moment sketch his background to show what can happen even from a rural high school in North Carolina: Navy Distinguished Flying Cross, 3 air medals, 13 Strike Flight Air Medals, Navy Commendation Medal, Navy Unit Citation, Vietnam Cross of Gallantry, and the Silver Star. He served during the Vietnam tour aboard the Kitty Hawk.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to realize in this hour of sadness and darkness the untapped resources we have with the American youth if properly developed.

So, in closing, once again my sincere sympathy to the families and all concerned.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

(Mr. GILMAN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

It is with a heavy heart that I rise to join my colleagues in expressing our condolences and personal sorrow to the families and loved ones of the crew of the Challenger shuttle mission 51-L:

Comdr. Francis Scobee, who logged more than 6,500 hours in 45 types of aircraft.

Pilot Michael Smith, an astronaut since 1980.

Mission specialist Judith Resnik, the first Jewish astronaut as well as one of the first women on board.

Mission specialist Ronald McNair, one of the first black astronauts.

Mission specialist Ellison S. Onizuka, the first Japanese-American in space.

Payload specialist S. Christa McAuliffe, a school teacher, ready to give lesson plans "on the ultimate first trip."

Payload specialist Gregory Jarvis, a Hughes Aircraft specialist.

Their courage, their dedication, and their sacrifice in their pursuit of new horizons in our Nation's space program will not be forgotten.

My congressional district has been touched by this tragedy. One of the astronaut's families, the Jarvis family, having formerly lived in my congressional district, and one of our district's teachers having been a finalist in the competition for the teacher member of the Challenger's crew.

It is hoped that this tragedy will not deter our space program but rather that the pioneering spirit of the dedicated crew of the Challenger mission 51-L will inspire us and motivate us to continue to pursue our explorations of space.

It is hoped that the knowledge that our entire Nation is sharing the grief of the families of this brave, dedicated Challenger crew will help to ease the burdens of the bereaved.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND], chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee which handles the budget on the space program.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the minority leader of the House of Representatives for taking this time to pay tribute and honor to the crew of the space shuttle Challenger.

As all of us have indicated today, this, of course, is one of the saddest days in this Nation's history. We lost today a crew of seven on the 25th flight of the space shuttle.

I have stood in the well of this House many times since the inception of the space program and I have often said that the space shuttle was this Nation's most complicated and complex technological achievement. It has flown to this day 24 times without mishap. No other space vehicle ever built by the mind or the hand of man by any nation, including our own, can make that claim. And as so many Members have said here today, we cannot let this terrible tragedy stop us from going ahead. Man and woman will work and will live in space.

Everything humanly possible is done to make these flights as safe as possible, but nothing in life is risk free. Nothing is foolproof. And today we have learned that lesson in the most tragic and in the very saddest way. Every astronaut who has flown on the shuttle, to a man and to a woman, recognizes that their work is indeed a risk. But they all recognize that their work is vital to our own spirit as a nation, and it is my judgment, and the judgment of all of those in this House that we can best honor their spirit, their courage, and their dedication by reaffirming their belief in the human exploration of space.

The names, Mr. Speaker, of Comdr. Francis R. Scobee, Pilot Michael J. Smith, Mission Specialist Judith A. Resnik, Mission Specialist Ellison Onizuka, Mission Specialist Ronald E. McNair, Payload Specialist Gregory Jarvis all will be remembered by this Nation forever.

So, too, will be the name of Christa McAuliffe, the teacher, the teacher who lifted the spirits of teachers and students and uncounted numbers of people across the Nation, yea, and across the world.

To their families, Mr. Speaker, I offer my deepest sympathy and pray that the Lord will grace upon it His choicest blessings in the years to come.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege as the ranking minority member of the Appropriations Subcommittee for NASA to get to meet, to chat with and sometimes even to break bread with most of those who have flown the shuttles, including some of those on today's tragic flight. They have all been fine people and it is a terrible loss.

Obviously, both the authorizing committee and our appropriations subcommittee is going to have to ask a lot of questions about how and why this happened and what its implications are for the space program in general and the shuttle program in particular. However, today is not the day for those questions, and it is certainly not the day to leap to any premature judgment about the program. Instead it is a day to mourn our losses, the personal losses of those who had known those involved in the flight, the losses of the families and friends of those on the flight and, above all, of the Nation's loss of these fine people.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER].

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, the heart of America is heavy today in sympathy with the agony of the families and friends who have lost their treasured loved ones in today's shuttle accident.

Mr. Speaker, we look back over the long line of heroes and heroines of the past and we see they have all been noble figures, constantly lifting the spirit of man from Earth into vaster areas and larger spheres of freedom.

Jesus died that the spirit of man might be free. Intrepid patriots have laid their lives upon the alter of freedom for their beloved land. Adventurers have scaled the highest mountain peaks reaching for the summit in the ethereal skies. Many of them, too, have paid the price of their lives. To have others seeking the North and the South Poles, the remote and frigid parts of our Earth. That indefatigable, that adventurous spirit of man has ever been rising to higher and higher levels.

We have paid much for our conquest in the field of aviation. I have on my office wall a photograph, the first flight at Kitty Hawk, NC, in 1903 by Orville Wright given to me by him.

In that flight, he rose for a few feet.

The first time I ever saw an airplane in Birmingham, AL, in 1910, the pilot rose a few hundred feet into the air and lost his life. And down through the years, so many have paid the price of their lives for the great conquests we have made in the mystic areas of space.

But, Mr. Speaker, the soul of man, destined eventually to reside in a heavenly home, will not be deterred by another costly sacrifice.

Other intrepid men and women will rise again to the challenge, and we will reach further and further into the mysteries of space, trying to reach our kindred spirits' home.

May the Lord extend his consolation to the bereaved of these noble heroes.

Give them the comfort that Lincoln bestowed upon the mother who had given so many of her sons to the cause of freedom. How fortunate they are to have made so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of man's highest dreams and noblest aspirations.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KOLBE].

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Speaker, today's tragedy with the space shuttle is a stark reminder that we still stand on the edge of a deep and dangerous frontier when we venture into space. Fifty-five successful launches, without the loss of any life, is a record of which we can be justifiably proud. But those who entered this frontier knew the dangers they faced, and yet they went willingly and bravely.

The Space Program, with all of the contributions it has made to medical technology, has saved the lives of literally thousands of people here at home.

With each new launch of the space shuttle, we have pushed back the frontier of space and improved our lives here on Earth.

But these advances are not without cost, and we are reminded of that today with this tragedy.

I join with each of my colleagues, I know, in expressing my deep sense of loss for this tragedy and my sympathy to each of the families.

Not many months ago I attended a reception in Tucson for Arizona's finalist among the teachers. I remember well his hopes and his dreams he expressed to me to be the teacher that went into space, and I know today what thoughts are in his mind. I know the anguish he feels and the anguish of each of the families of these brave men and women.

Those families can take some solace in the knowledge that their wives and husbands, their fathers and their mothers, have joined the pantheon of American heroes who have made our conquest of space possible, as those before them have made the conquest of other frontiers possible.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE].

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, in this hour of grief, our hearts go out to the members of the families. Almost simultaneously, we are being asked, "What will now happen to our Space Program? Will it be weakened, or will we stop?" And the answer is a resounding no, we will not stop. We will have a full review and evaluation of our procedures, our technologies. But when that is concluded I am confident we will move forward. If the voices of any of the astronauts aboard the Challenger could be heard today, I think they would cry out loudly and strongly, "Go forward, do not let up. We were committed, we are confident the American people should be committed."

And, Mr. Speaker, we will go forward because it is in the best interest of mankind.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, words are not adequate to express our shock and our sorrow. The sorrow we feel is in the hearts of all Americans at this moment.

The best that America has to give have given their last full measure on the cutting edge of technology, challenging the unknown, in order to know, reaching for the future in order to better teach our young who indeed are the pioneers of the future.

These young men and women have not given their lives in vain. Their contribution as pioneers of the frontier that is our tomorrow will live forever in the annals of space flight and space exploration.

It is now for us to go forward to better understand their challenge and to go forward with a new surge of commitment in their honor. It is the least that they would ask.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today we are as a country all united in our sense of tragedy and sadness, and our hearts really do go out to the families and the friends and, in a sense, to ourselves, because we know the crew members represented the best that was America. They were so vibrant, so educated, so hard working. In a sense, they represented us in their exploration of space.

And so they are genuine heroes, tragic heroes, to us.

I really extend my sympathy to all of the families of the seven crew members, but I cannot help pointing out that Judy Resnik was from northeast Ohio. We were, in greater Cleveland and Akron, very proud of her. She was the second woman to explore space, and she was a mission specialist. Her parents were both very, very proud of her indeed.

As a former teacher, I was thrilled that Christa McAuliffe was going to have an opportunity to not only represent those of us who are civilians but to place the art of teaching on a new lofty level.

And I believe that she would want to instill in her students something that she herself personified, and that is a thirst for knowledge. I believe very strongly that she would want us to continue in our thirst for knowledge in exploring the mysteries of space.

We have all reaped many, many benefits from space exploration. Today we sustain a deep loss, but let us in the memory of these seven heroes rededicate ourselves to this new adventure and to the safety and success of the Space Program.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN].

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, unlike many of my colleagues, I did not personally know any of the seven who died today. In fact, until the last few hours, I could not remember their names or their color or their sex or what number the flight was. I knew one was a woman and a teacher. But with what even seemed like overdrawn hype, that name seemed a bit vague to me. The shuttle seemed a little like the Metro or, back in my home area, the RTA. Sometimes there were delays, but the Space Program had seemed almost boring. Then, in a flash, the shuttle chariot was swallowed in its own sun, and the price for this leap into the future became very clear.

When I was young, I used to read a lot of science fiction: Ray Bradbury, Robert Heinlein, Asimov, Van Camp, and others, every bit of it I could get my hands on. And I had an incredible belief that some day I would go to Mars. I became a teacher. And, in fact, today I am not even comfortable in an airplane. But seven men and women read those same books and refused to stay earthbound. On this flight, there were black and white, male and female, an Asian-American and a blond male named Smith. It was America. There was even a civilian who was a teacher and who said them that can, both act and teach.

They were all of us. For their families and for their friends, our hearts and our prayers. For the rest of us, the danger and the joy of the leap to the future are again entwined.

Now their names become history. But their drive and the dream of the human spirit will not die. In the flash and fire, the dream was reborn again in other young men and young women who will read, learn, and fly. To the crew of the Challenger we say goodbye, but we will not forget you and your dream.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in expressing my personal sorrow at today's tragedy.

Sometimes an event strikes us with such drama and surprise that it exceeds our ability to absorb it. This is what happened today in the terrible destruction of our country's space shuttle.

The space shuttle carried on its side the flag of the United States. And those who served on her served us, the American people.

They served our hopes for scientific exploration and for human progress. But they also served our dreams because they lived at the frontier of what mankind can achieve together.

Today, as our shock turns to sadness, we salute those who risked and gave their lives to serve our country at the last great frontier. We salute those who died performing exploits that people of my age grew up reading about in comic books or in fiction.

These wonderful people—Francis Scobee, Michael Smith, Judith Resnik, Ronald McNair, Ellison Onizuka, Christa McAuliffe, and Gregory Jarvis—died performing their duty. They died not as individuals but as a crew, working as a team, united in devotion and commitment to the United States, their country.

This afternoon we are united in the same spirit as the crew. Oh, our deep feeling for them. We pray for these brave Americans, for their families and for our country.

We are delighted that the resolution comes before us as the product of the majority leader of the House and the minority leader of the House, and it allows us to express our sentiments on this day of sorrow.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the resolution now under consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, as a nation we may never be able to measure the extent of our loss from today's tragic explosion of the space shuttle Challenger. This tragedy has robbed us of the lives of seven American heroes—the shuttle crew members. It has turned hope into tears for thousands of school children who were thrilled with the expectation of a classroom from space. And it has sent the people of our country into deep mourning and sad reflection. Each of us shares the pain.

The seven crew members gave their lives to America, and it is important to express what this means to us. Since the founding of our Nation, brave pioneers have risked their lives to conquer successive frontiers—and our Nation has prospered and grown because of them. Years ago the frontier was the wild West. Today it is space and technology. In the truest sense of the word, each of these seven crew members on the space shuttle Challenger was an American pioneer. For they gave their lives unlocking the mysteries of the heavens—so that the rest of us could benefit from the vast sources of knowledge to be gained. We will remember their sacrifice.

To our Nation's honor roll we will add the names of Christa McAuliffe, the social studies teacher from Concord, NH, who bravely accepted the role as the first "common person" to go up in space; retired Air Force Maj. Francis R. "Dicky" Scobee, the flight commander; Navy Comdr. Michael J. Smith, the pilot; mission specialists Judith Resnik, Ronald McNair, and Air Force Lt. Col. Ellison S. Onizuka; and payload specialist, from Hughes Aircraft Co., Greg Jarvis.

This was going to be a very special space shuttle flight. With the presence of a high school teacher, Christa McAuliffe, and the planned classroom from space, this shuttle was really dedicated to the children of our Nation—to inspire their imagination and lift their eyes to the future. This makes the tragedy doubly sad.

I want to extend my condolences to the families and friends of the crew members, and to offer them all the strength they need in the difficult days ahead. My thoughts are with them.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join with millions of Americans—young and old—in expressing our sorrow and grief over the tragic loss of the seven astronauts this morning aboard the space shuttle Challenger.

My thoughts and prayers go out today to the families and loved ones of these seven heroes. We mourn them in death and we vow never to forget the lessons they taught us in life—that we must reach for the stars and seize all the opportunities and challenges we can.

As we grieve today for the six professional astronauts who were on board the Challenger, we each share special sorrow at the tragic death of Christa McAuliffe who was to be the first teacher in space.

While I did not know Mrs. McAuliffe personally, I certainly knew of her. I knew that she and her husband once lived in Maryland and I knew that she came back to our State this past fall to speak to students and teachers in Prince Georges County where she once lived and taught.

During her remarks last fall, Christa McAuliffe told the teachers and students of Prince Georges County how proud she was to have been selected to represent her profession and her Nation on a space shuttle flight. She challenged teachers and students alike to "reach for the stars" in everything they do; she urged them to always do the best they can and to be true to themselves.

Christa McAuliffe said she is in touch with the future every day because she is a teacher, touching the lives of the very people who represent our future—our students.

These seven heroes died today not as individuals but as a team. They represented the best America has to offer; they embodied the same spirit, energy and life that President Kennedy saw in all of us when he called us to reach for new frontiers.

President Kennedy wasn't just calling on our astronauts to seek these new frontiers, he was calling on all of us. He would have been as proud of these seven heroes as all of us are, he would have mourned their tragic deaths, and he would have urged us to continue to "reach for the stars" and so do I.

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, I share the shock and sadness felt by the entire Nation over the loss of the space shuttle Challenger and its crew of seven astronauts.

The men and women who go into space are special people. I have met with former astronauts in Washington, and they are motivated by a special sense of mission.

Today we lost seven adventurers, seven heroes. In many ways, they represent the best America has to offer. They were conscious of the danger, but eager to push back the limits of human knowledge.

Our prayers are with the souls of the lost crew and with their families.

There should be a comprehensive NASA investigation of the fiery explosion which destroyed the spacecraft. But I emphasize the need to continue the space program.

We must mourn our dead, take care of their families, learn from the tragedy, and turn our eyes to the stars again.

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, this is a very tragic day in American history. It is especially difficult for those of us in South Carolina and the Sixth Congressional District who knew and admired Astronaut Dr. Ronald McNair of Lake City.

I want to extend to his devoted family my deepest sympathy. They will certainly face some difficult hours in the days ahead. If there is any consolation, I hope they will remember that Ron McNair was a pioneer. He gave his life in service to our country.

Ron McNair represented the very best of this Nation—in spirit, courage, intellect, and dedication. Those are fine qualities and having had the good fortune to meet Dr. McNair, I want to assure you that he embodied all of these characteristics.

When I met him in February of 1984, I was very impressed. In addition to his keen intellect, Dr. McNair was a kind, humble, and very genuine human being.

I want to again express my sympathy to Dr. McNair's family and to all of the families of the astronauts aboard the mission.

In Dr. McNair, we have lost a gifted scientist, a talented individual, and a dedicated American—we have lost a giant among men.

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, the tragic death of the space shuttle astronauts touches each of us in a very personal and emotional way. As a nation, we share a great sense of loss.

These pioneers carried with them the hopes and dreams of all Americans. We draw strength from their courage.

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, at 11:38 this morning, a group of seven astronauts on the space shuttle Challenger, including the first private citizen, teacher Christa McAuliffe, lost their lives in a terrible accident some 9 miles above the coast of Cape Canaveral. Words cannot express the grief that I and all Americans feel for these individuals, and their loved ones.

After 24 successful shuttle flights, many Americans took the frequent flights as routine. I can guarantee you, the men and women who participated in every one of the previous 24 missions understood the dangers involved, and they proceeded undaunted.

As we have become accustomed to their successes, we tend to forget that these astronauts risk their lives each time they step on board. Our Nation has reaped the benefits of their courage. We owe it to those lost today that every effort be made to understand the circumstances behind the events of this morning.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, along with all of my colleagues, I am deeply saddened at the loss of the Challenger crew members in this morning's tragic accident. Our Nation will long mourn the passing of these brave and courageous young Americans who lost their lives serving their country's space exploration program.

Americans will always remember the selfless dedication that these men and women brought to the task of pushing back the barriers of space. My heart goes out to the families and loved ones of these brave Challenger crew members. Their achievement in life will long serve as an inspiration to those who seek to expand the boundaries of our knowledge of space.

The Ninth Congressional District of Texas, which I represent, is the home of the Johnson Space Center where these valiant Americans and their fellow astronauts who will crew future flights of the shuttle have been trained. We mourn this tragic loss of our friends and neighbors.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, as were so many of my colleagues, I was deeply saddened and shocked to learn of the loss of the crew of the shuttle Challenger. For over a quarter of a century through 55 successful manned space flights, we have been able to avoid this type of horrendous inflight accident, and it is truly difficult to put into words our great sense of loss now that such a tragedy has occurred.

Throughout our history as a Nation, brave men and women have risked their lives in order to conquer new frontiers, and our country has prospered and grown because of their selfless efforts. Our seven astronauts—the flight's commander, retired Air Force Maj. Francis R. "Dicky" Scobee; the pilot, Navy Comdr. Michael J. Smith; mission specialists, Judith Resnik, Ronald McNair, and Air Force Lt. Col. Ellison S. Onizuka; payload specialist, Greg Jarvis; and social studies teacher, Christa McAuliffe—were all pioneers. They were great Americans willing to take extraordinary risks—even to that of risking their lives—in order to gain knowledge and to advance our technology.

These seven astronauts were representative of the hopes, dreams, and strength of America—men and women of all races, colors, and creeds, coming from all walks of life, and diverse in their ethnic and religious backgrounds. They served our country and died, not as individuals, but as a team, representative of the best America has to offer, and they leave behind a legacy of all that is great about America.

As a former high school teacher, I know how great an inspiration our first nongovernment civilian astronaut, Christa McAuliffe, was to her own students as well as to students throughout this country. Her spirit and the spirit of her co-crewmembers will continue to inspire future generations to work toward expanding the boundaries of human knowledge.

Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in the House of Representatives in mourning the tremendous loss of our astronauts, and I want to extend my deepest sympathy to the families and friends of these courageous seven crewmembers. Our entire Nation remembers them in our prayers and we salute these brave individuals who sacrificed their lives on behalf of our country.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, since 1961, when John F. Kennedy set us upon the high road to manned space exploration, Americans have cherished and have loved its heroes in a special way. These men and women have embodied for us the American spirit of hope, the adventure and promise of new frontiers. We have reveled in the program's many triumphs, and now are stunned to silence by its greatest disaster—a tragedy which has taken from us the lives of seven brave explorers: Capt. Francis "Dick" Scobee, Michael Smith, Judith Resnick, Ellison Onizuka, Ronald McNair, Christa McAuliffe, and Gregory Jarvis.

Their sacrifice is best honored by our rededication to the vision of the future that they carried so close to their own hearts. We must renew our resolve to go forward with the space program and not allow this tragedy to turn our enthusiasm from our greatest frontier. It is in our natures to explore. John Kennedy, in his address to the students of Rice University, said: "If * * * history * * * teaches us anything, it is that man, in his quest for knowledge and progress, is determined and cannot be deterred."

Our shuttle program has suffered a setback. That is obvious. But it is critical to the future of our country that we heed the words of John Kennedy. Our greatest challenges and our richest rewards lie in the unknown of space. We will accept that challenge. We can do no less for our country and for the Challenger seven.

Perhaps we had come to expect near-flawless shuttle flights. Perhaps our understanding of the danger of each journey had been dulled by the many easy liftoffs and smooth landings we have witnessed over the past 5 years.

But no shuttle flight is routine. No astronaut or crew member is ordinary. The enormous risks willingly accepted by our shuttle crews with every liftoff is a shining testament to their courage, the clarity of their vision, their selfless search for knowledge. In the words of Shakespeare:

When he shall die,
Take him and cut him out in little stars,
And he will make the face of heaven so fine
That all the world will be in love with night.

Having witnessed the worst tragedy of our 25 years in space, we see our heaven now hung with the shining stars of these seven brave heroes who gave us everything. Someday soon, we will watch as another shuttle orbiter shoots through the Florida skies destined for the eternal night of space. And then we will again fall in love with flight and with our Nation's still-young dream of manned space exploration.

In the meantime, our prayers are with the families and the friends of the Challenger crew.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, we mourn as a nation the loss of the seven Challenger crew members.

They embodied the American spirit with their courage and quest for knowledge. Despite the element of risk inherent in any space flight, they bravely trained and prepared for their mission knowing of the wealth of information and realm of benefits it would provide our Nation.

Having served as a member of the Appropriations Subcommittee which funds the Space Program, and as a member of the Defense Appropriations Committee, I know of the dedication and motivation required of NASA pilots and mission specialists. They are a special group of individuals who have the opportunity to open the door to an area of science full of useful applications and unanswered questions.

As Americans, we watch and share in their successes, and today we share in their sorrow and grief. We offer our sincerest sympathy to the families of Comdr. Francis Scobee, Michael Smith, Ronald McNair, Lt. Col. Ellison Onizuka, and Gregory Jarvis. I also am saddened by the loss of Judith Resnik who held a special place in the heart of many Pinellas County residents. She graciously accepted my invitation to participate in an October 1984 program at the Bay Pines Veterans' Administration Medical Center. Her warmth and sincerity touched the audience and brightened the day of the hospitalized patients she took time to visit.

Finally, we say a special prayer for Christa McAuliffe. She shared with us her spirit and enthusiasm and symbolized as a teacher the search for knowledge that is the goal of our Space Program.

In the spirit of these seven Americans, our Nation will continue to be the world leader in the exploration of space. They will forever be a part of our future achievements and advancements. They also will remain a small part of all Americans because they have given us a sense of their pride, courage, and bravery—qualities that have sustained explorers throughout our Nation's proud history.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, needless to say, I rise in support of the resolution. I did not personally know any of the seven people involved in the flight, except as human beings.

I would like to raise the obvious question which has been trickling around in my mind as I hear the speeches here: Is it worth it? Is it worth it? Some have already answered this question as they mourn for the families and express sympathy. And as we lament over the next few days and next few weeks and try to find out what caused it, I just hope, as we pray and talk to the Lord God Almighty, that we ask him for guidance and to give us a sense of direction so that we might determine our purpose for space exploration. I hope our motivation is something more than just trying to keep pace with the Soviet Union.

We do it based on a determination and decision as to what it is going to do to help mankind. I could not help but listen to the amount of money that went down with these lives of these seven people; $3.2 billion for one spaceship. How many people who are hungry today that might be helped if we decide to continue, we must understand.

I have not made a decision as to whether or not we should continue or not. I want guidance as to whether or not we are going in the right direction. I think we ought to be able to understand and be motivated for other purposes other than to just keep pace with somebody else at the expense and risk of lives.

Robots may be used for this purpose; I am not a scientist, I do not know. Certainly we have had success and I do not want to ignore it. But I just want us to think and think deeply and pray over this situation and ask the good Lord to give us a sense of direction as to where to go from here.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA].

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I join the rest of my colleagues today on behalf of my constituency to extend our sympathy to the families of those that sacrificed their lives today on behalf of our country.

Mr. Speaker, I think that in what we have heard from a lot of the Members, perhaps one thing that has been to the point of being mentioned but it has not, and I think that my tribute to them would be this: The world will send condolences to our President. Why? Because they saw it. I think this is a tribute to our country, to our system, to our heritage that we do nothing in a closed shop. That these brave men and women for the world to see were there. They sacrificed their lives where every person in this world will be able to see.

That is what space exploration is about. That is what legislation is about. That is what we do here today. That the principle freedom cannot be achieved unless it is in an open society. Equal rights and justice cannot be achieved unless it is in an open society. There we have for the world our successes and our failures, and they sacrificed in one of the failures their last devotion of duty to this great country of ours and to what it means to have a free, open society. I think the tribute in their lives should be dedicated. We should in fact dedicate ourselves to the fact that they were willing and that they went. But more so that our system of government allowed it for the world to see.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, this gentleman from California is stunned by this tragic event. The crew of the shuttle captured our hearts and we mourn for them and their families.

Ellison Onizuka was a personal friend of my wife, May, and me. He was the first American of Japanese ancestry to become an astronaut and we were all so proud of him. Christa McAuliffe captured the attention of this Nation's teachers and children, and all our hopes for the future possibilities of the Space Program.

And we lost so much NASA talent—veterans of past missions who with courage and commitment had devoted their careers to scientific exploration. These were exceptional men and women and we will never fully recover from this loss.

We will mourn, but we will continue to push for progress in space. As a member of the Space Science and Applications Subcommittee of the House Committee on Science and Technology, I will urge my colleagues to join with me in this commitment. The best memorial to the sacrifices made by those on the shuttle Challenger would be to strive to continue their heroic efforts.

Clearly a full investigation will have to be conducted, and we will anxiously await the findings. At this moment, all we have is conjecture as to what happened.

The SPEAKER. All time has expired.

The Clerk will report the final resolving clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House do now adjourn as a further mark of respect to the memory of the valiant crew members of the "Challenger" shuttle mission.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

SENATE—Tuesday, January 28, 1986

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Gracious God, with gratitude we remember those in the Senate responsible to keep multitudinous and diverse Senate records. Thank You for Russ Walker, editor in chief of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, his assistant editor, the official reporters of debates and expert transcribers. Thank you for the legislative, journal, and bill clerks and the parliamentarians. Thank you for their commitment to accuracy and the awesome responsibility they bear to be free from error. Thank You for their remarkable skills, their tireless dedication which requires their presence, not only when the Senate is in, but before it convenes and often long after it has recessed. Help them to realize, Father, the inestimable esteem in which they are held and grant to all who benefit from their faithful labors never to forget how essential their expert services are to life and business in the Senate. Bless them and their loved ones with "every spiritual blessing in Christ," in whose name we pray. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished acting majority leader is recognized.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, it is my pleasure to represent the majority leader who, at this time, is meeting with the President at the White House.

SCHEDULE

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the two leaders will be recognized for 10 minutes each. Then there will be a special order in favor of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Following the execution of this special order, there will then be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 12 noon, with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

The Senate will stand in recess between the hours of 12 noon and 2 p.m. in order for the weekly party caucuses to meet. At 2 p.m., the Senate will resume consideration of the Conrail measure, S. 638. Rollcall votes can be expected in relation to that bill during today's session.

The majority leader asks that Senators assemble in the Senate Chamber at not later than 8:30 p.m. this evening to proceed as a body to the Hall of the House of Representatives to hear the President's State of the Union Address.

ROMANIA'S TRADE PRIVILEGES

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, I rise today to underscore my concern about the continued extension of special trade privileges to the repressive regime in Romania.

Since the United States granted most-favored-nation status to Romania in 1975, the West has received a steady stream of reports about severe human rights abuses by the Ceausescu regime. Yet, for each of those 10 years, America has renewed its decision to confer special benefits on Romania.

It is time to base our policy on reality.

Romania's foreign policy is not independent of the Soviet Union's. In fact, Ceausescu is deeply devoted to Marxism, and the only recent major issue on which he has differed with the Soviet line was whether to send Romanian athletes to the most recent Olympiad.

Second, Romania's moderation in foreign policy is largely mythic. Ceausescu has offered support to the PLO and other terrorist organizations, and Romania is ranked along with the other nations of the Soviet bloc in opposing the United States in votes at the United Nations.

Finally, Romania is said to be less repressive than the Soviet Union, and to be open to Western overtures that might lead to an improvement in the human rights situation there. In fact, during the last 10 years when Romanian-American trade has flourished, the Romanian secret police extended this reach into the lives of Romanian citizens. Surveillance, harassment, and persecution of religious and political believers have increased markedly.

For that reason, I have sponsored S. 1817, a bill to suspend Romania's MFN status for 6 months. I urge my colleagues to join me as cosponsors of this legislation, and I thank the chairmen of the Foreign Relations Committee and the Finance Committee for agreeing to hold hearings on this important matter.

I ask unanimous consent that an article by a former aide to Romania's President Ceausescu be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Jan. 13, 1986]

CEAUSESCU: AMERICA'S MOST FAVORED TYRANT

(By Ion Mihai Pacepa)

For many Americans, Romania's Nicolae Ceausescu is the leader of the plucky little country that defied the Soviet boycott of the 1984 Olympic Games in Los Angeles. For the U.S. government, he presides over the communist country whose "most favored nation," or MFN, trade status should be renewed when it comes up for its annual review. In Washington's misguided view, MFN status can help improve human rights in Romania and encourage a degree of political independence from Moscow.

But for Mr. Ceausescu, the 1975 granting of MFN status crowned 10 years of intense propaganda and influence operations aimed at realizing his grand plan of strengthening Romanian communism by getting financial and technological help from capitalism.

DEVOTION TO STALINIST MARXISM

In October, Rep. Chris Smith (R., N.J.) and Sen. Paul Trible (R., Va.) introduced legislation that would deny Romania MFN status for six months. However, even this modest step is opposed by the State Department. In fact, during his last visit last month to Romania, Secretary of State George Shultz said that "[The U.S.] would like to see trade [with Romania] flourish to the extent that it can. I believe that it can increase more in the future—and I hope it does."

Meanwhile, average Romanians—who receive few, if any, of the benefits of MFN status—face another bitter winter without adequate heat or light. The near-collapse of the Romanian economy has led to rumors that the Soviets would not at all mind if the army toppled Mr. Ceausescu and installed a military government similar to the one that has run Poland since 1981. However, any such move is unlikely. For all of his economic bungling, Mr. Ceausescu still delivers valuable exports to the Soviet Union and serves as a conduit for the transmission of embargoed Western technolgy to Moscow.

Continuing to renew Romania's MFN status will not make that nation more independent of the Kremlin. Mr. Ceausescu's devotion to Stalinist Marxism is clear even to naive observers. I worked with him for many years, and the one thing I came to understand was that his position toward Moscow was never influenced by the U.S. Rather, it was primarily determined by the nature of his personal relationship with the Kremlin's top man. Yuri Andropov, whom I met, seemed to show less rigidity toward Mr. Ceausescu than Leonid Brezhnev had; Mikhall Gorbachev is apparently following the same policy.

According to recent reports, relations with Moscow are getting closer again, with a large Soviet presence once more in Romania. In addition, secret bilateral agreements with Moscow, such as those between the two intelligence services for the procurement of Western technology, are sacred obligations for Mr. Ceausescu.

Human rights in Romania have been strangled since the granting of MFN status in 1975. The proportion of security personnel in the population has steadily increased over the years, reaching a ratio of 1:15—the world's highest—by the time of my break with Bucharest in 1978. Selective mail censorship was replaced in 1976 with total censorship, with every single letter and package from abroad being opened. In February 1977 a secret Communist Party decision approved the complete monitoring of all international telephone calls. At the same time, Mr. Ceausescu personally ordered that the only legally permissible telephone device to be used was one developed by the security police that can be instantly converted into a microphone to monitor people's private conversations.

During the mid-1970s electronic monitoring devices were secretly installed in every Roman Catholic church and Jewish synagogue. In March 1978 a top-secret decision by Mr. Ceausescu required that all but a few token Jews be quietly removed from the military and security forces as well as from sensitive posts in the party and government.

Bucharest's terrorism against the West has also increased substantially. In the mid-1970s there was a surge in the secret training given in Romania to Western communists, especially Spaniards and Greeks, in sabotage and other forms of guerrilla warfare. In 1975 the DIE, the Romanian foreign intelligence service, made secret agreements with Palestine Liberation Organization terrorists, providing them with significant logistical support and using them in operations against Romania's own political opponents in the West.

In 1975, only days after receiving MFN status, Romania had its DIE secretly kill three militant anti-communists in the West, one of whom, Vasile Zapartan, was a priest. The DIE later organized assassination attempts and savage beatings of emigres who had publicly criticized the cult of personality in Romania, using PLO terrorists in France in 1976 and criminal mercenaries in both West Germany in 1976 and Frnace in 1977. In July 1978 I personally received the order to arrange unattributable assassinations of emigres working for the U.S. government in Radio Free Europe, and to bomb the radio's Munich headquarters (an action that finally took place in February 1981).

On July 28, 1981, Emil Georgescu, a senior editor at Radio Free Europe in Munich, was stabbed 22 times by criminals hired by Bucharest and barely escaped with his life. (He was one of the people I had been ordered to have killed.)

Nevertheless, Bucharest has always considered itself able to outwit Washington in obtaining the annual renewal of MFN. The only significant step I saw Mr. Ceausescu take to ensure the renewal was his August 1975 appointment of a permanent MFN task force, consisting of the minister of foreign affairs, the minister of interior, and the deputy chief of the DIE (at that time myself). Because the U.S. indicated that Romania's emigration policy was the key to MFN renewal, Mr Ceausescu decided to maintain emigration from Romania (mostly Jews and ethnic Germans) at the minimum level but no higher. "We should make as much money as possible on our vanishing national resources—oil, Jews and Germans," he told the task force.

As part of the task force, the DIE was also responsible for selling the West on the myth of Mr. Ceausescu's domestic popularity and persuading the U.S. government to like Romania. The DIE paid for the Western publication of hundreds of articles and books about Mr. Ceausescu's accomplishments. It mounted successful operations to develop sources of influence at the U.S. Embassy in Bucharest and to exert pressure through agents and contacts in the U.S. It created and financed Romanian emigre organizations in the U.S., which paid for thousands of emigres to come periodically to Washington from all over the U.S. and Canada to demonstrate and lobby on Capitol Hill for MFN renewal.

Nor will the most recent renewal of MFN status improve U.S.-Romanian relations. Bucharest is now apparently pressing for a new official visit by Mr. Ceausescu to Washington, but its Oriental-rug-merchant approach to bilateral relations is entirely different from the American one. I personally was responsible for preparing Mr. Ceausescu's last visit to the U.S., in April 1978, and I also then accompanied him as a member of his official delegation.

Mr. Ceausescu assigned the visit a more pragmatic mission besides its political significance: setting the stage for the secret development and eventual recruitment of President Carter's brother, Bill. Because I broke with Bucharest shortly thereafter, the only tangible result of this planned operation was the Romanian commercial office opened in Atlanta as a first step.

BUCHAREST OUTFOXES WASHINGTON

The tactic of recruiting close relatives of foreign heads of state is one in which Mr. Ceausescu excels. On one official visit to Iran, he himself spotted the corrupt brother of the late shah as a likely prospect, and in Syria he saw potential in the then-powerful brother of President Hafez Assad. Both were later recruited, royally rewarded by fat payments into Swiss bank accounts, and used for promoting Romanian political and economic interests. Perhaps someday another Romanian defector will tell us what Mr. Ceausescu's ulterior motive is for his next visit to Washington. In any case, we may be sure that he has more than the exchange of mutual compliments in mind.

Bucharest is successfully outfoxing Washington day after day. The U.S. now has 10 years' worth of proof that MFN does not produce the desired effect in Romania, and enough is enough. America must stop supporting a communist regime that is scornful of American democratic principles and hostile to U.S. interests.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

Mr. TRIBLE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the majority leader's time be reserved for his use later in the day, and I also ask unanimous consent that the time of the Democratic leader be reserved for his use later in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. KASSEBAUM). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TRIBLE. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Chair.

WHY WE MUST NEGOTIATE AN END TO NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTING

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, most thoughtful people believe that nuclear weapons are here to stay. The two most powerful people on Earth, President Ronald Reagan and Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev, disagree. President Reagan contends that the star wars missile defense system is the first step toward the permanent destruction of nuclear weapons. Secretary Gorbachev goes farther and faster. He agrees with President Reagan that nuclear weapons can be eliminated from the face of the Earth. But Secretary Gorbachev tells us it can be done in the next 14 years.

Could Reagan and Gorbachev be right? Can we destroy all nuclear weapons everywhere? Can we stop them from ever being constructed again? The answer is a loud, emphatic and certain "no." The prospect of stopping the development of a nuclear bomb died on December 2, 1942, when Enrico Fermi successfully tested the nuclear chain reaction. That was the first and fatal test. Once the theory of how to produce a nuclear bomb explosion had been designed, and especially once it had been tested and found to work, there was no more chance that this knowledge could be forever suppressed than there was that we could disinvent the gasoline engine, or the electric light, or gun powder.

In all the long history of mankind, there has never been a scientific development that could provide economic advantage or military power that has been disinvented. The greater the military power a weapon possesses, the more clearly impossible it would be to ban the knowledge, once the knowledge has been proven and established by testing. Since there has been such an extraordinarily potent military force as the nuclear bomb, this weapon is henceforth and forever a sure companion of man on Earth.

We cannot perform some kind of forget-it operation or amnesia—anesthesia on the minds of the thousands of scientists who know how to design nuclear weapons. This Senator believes that verification can accomplish far more than many of his colleagues believe. But I do not believe that no matter how we advance our verification or improve our intelligence, we could verify the destruction of every last nuclear weapon on Earth. Even with an agreement for intensive, unannounced, on-the-spot inspection, weapons could be concealed. There is no way the five acknowledged nuclear-weapon nations could assure each other that every last nuclear bomb has been destroyed.

And what happens if they could? Imagine the incentive for a Libya or Syria or Iran or any one of more than 150 other nations to suddenly achieve superpower status with their own monopoly on nuclear power. Gorbachev and Reagan are wrong. Nuclear weapons are here to stay. Forever. That's the first fundamental fact to accept.

So the real question is: How do we live in peace with nuclear weapons? If we cannot ban nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth, what can we do?

For the answer, we should go back to that Fermi test of December 2, 1942. That was the last chance to stop the development of nuclear weapons on Earth. If neither Fermi nor anyone else had tested the nuclear reaction, the idea, the theory might have persisted but the bomb itself would never have been proven or established. In 1963 and again in 1974, the United States, together with the Soviet Union, promised to negotiate a comprehensive mutual end to all nuclear weapons testing. Two hundred and seven members of the House have cosponsored a resolution that would call on the President to negotiate such an agreement. Once the superpowers successfully agree to end nuclear testing, they could both vigorously pursue an attempt to bring the other nuclear weapon nations into the agreement.

Would such an agreement be simply 44 years too late? No indeed. Nuclear weapons labs in the Soviet Union and in the United States are working feverishly to develop newer, cheaper, more efficient weapons than either superpower has in its arsenal now. As these new weapons are developed and proven by testing, we should keep in mind they are—like the first Fermi nuclear reactions, forever.

Could that destroy the prospects for world peace? You betcha! Consider just one among many haunting possibilities: The antimatter bomb. Einstein's antimatter theory has never been developed into a weapon that has been tested. But that may be happening right now. Such a weapon would be to the present nuclear weapons what the present weapons are to the gun powder in a shotgun. The force of the energy freed with the antimatter principle would exceed by a factor of 100 or more the present most powerful nuclear explosion.

Think what could be packed into a terrorist's suitcase or briefcase. Since the principal cost in nuclear weapons is the delivery system—that is the missile or the bomber or the submarine—consider how cheap such a device could be and therefore, how widely available to scores of nations.

The antimatter bomb is a few years away—depending on the intensity of the development program and especially on when the testing comes. The superpowers should work right now on ending this nightmare by a prompt agreement to negotiate a comprehensive, mutual, verifiable end to all nuclear weapons testing. Secretary Gorbachev has said he is ready. He has proposed some far-reaching verification procedures including on-the-spot inspection. We should take him up on them and take him up on them now.

ATTACKS ON REFUGEE CAMPS: A FLAGRANT RIGHTS ABUSE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, the United Nations High Commissioner on Refugees recently reported that armed attacks against refugee camps and settlements have been increasing in recent years. These acts of aggression are occurring around the world in places as diverse as Angola and Thailand, but they are alike in character. They are attacks against large concentrations of defenseless civilians. This is clearly reprehensible—a flagrant crime.

What is more, not only the scope but the type of violence is worsening. The UNHCR is witnessing "new forms of brutality and physical assaults against refugees, which by their horror and viciousness remind us of some of the worst manifestations of human wickedness."

The circumstances of these attacks vary. The assailants may come from across the borders and escape back into their own country where they go unpunished. Sometimes the host country denies the incident. The refugees are people without a homeland, without a government to protect their rights. Their only advocates are the international humanitarian groups who try to act as their witnesses. Countries are anxious not to tarnish their world image, so the hope is that a strong international presence will deter attacks against refugees.

We must add our voice to the outcries against such attacks—just as we must add our voice to the condemnation of genocide. It is crucial that we protect the rights of the powerless, and that we make our opposition to human rights abuses well known and indisputable. Genocide is the most outrageous of rights abuses. Ratification of the Genocide Convention is a fundamental statement for the rights of all people worldwide. It is the necessary first step.

A BILL TO REQUIRE SENATE CONFIRMATION OF THE FDA COMMISSIONER

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, today I am introducing legislation to require Senate confirmation of the Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration.

SCOPE OF RESPONSIBILITY

I can think of few officials at the Department of Health and Human Services with the broad scope of responsibility of the Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration. By contrast, Senate confirmation is required for 17 officials at the Department—including the Commissioner for Children, Families, and Youth; the Commissioner of Aging; and the Administrator of the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration [ADAMHA]—but few of these officials have a fraction of the FDA Commissioner's responsibilities.

Just consider the scope of FDA's jurisdiction:

The composition, quality, safety, and labeling of food, food additives, colors, and cosmetics;

Inspection of food and cosmetic producers' facilities, surveillance of advertising of prescription drugs, and researching consumer complaints;

Drug approval, ranging from premarket approval and insuring good manufacturing processes to monitoring the quality and labeling of marketed drugs;

Setting standards for radiation-emitting devices; and Responsibility for implementation of the Medical Devices Act.

It is hard to find any official at the Department of Health and Human Services, with the exception of the Secretary and the Administrator of the Health Care Financing Administration, whose decisions can affect so many Americans and whose decisions are so crucial to the protection of public health.

POLITICIZING THE FDA

With such sweeping responsibilities, the Commissioner of the FDA is often at the center of important decisions, attempting to reconcile public health considerations and economic considerations.

Unfortunately, there has been increasing political pressure to place economic considerations above considerations of public health and the three Commissioners to serve during the Reagan administration have been kept on increasingly short leashes. The result has been a triumph of politics over science and has led to criticism from both sides of the aisle on a number of issues:

Despite repeated recommendations by FDA scientists that a number of color additives caused cancer, the administration refused to even consider taking them off the market as the law required. They even took away the FDA Commissioner's authority to ban cancer-causing color additives, which past administrations had delegated to the Commissioner;

Despite a clear link between aspirin and Reye's syndrome, a potentially fatal disease, political pressure by the administration to accommodate industry resulted in the ill-fated decision to rely upon a voluntary warning label. Public outcry finally prompted the administration to reverse its position to assure protection for our Nation's children;

And while the FDA has finally taken action on sulfites, it took more than 21 deaths and more than 800 injuries caused by allergic reactions to sulfites before they were prodded to action. And then only in the face of possible legislative action.

And the list goes on and on. The administration still opposes complete labeling of all ingredients used in drugs, despite the strong support for such truth in labeling by the American Academy of Pediatrics and the American Medical Association.

The track record of the last 5 years makes it clear that the FDA Commissioner can no longer be just another hired hand of the administration. We don't need another team player. We need a tough, independent FDA Commissioner who can resist powerful political and economic interests.

Senate confirmation will help restore accountability and ensure that future FDA Commissioners understand that their first loyalty must be to the public trust they hold.

Madam. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be reprinted in the RECORD as well as an article from the Chicago Tribune, entitled "FDA 'Politicization' Called Hazardous to Health".

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Oct. 20, 1985]

FDA POLITICIZATION CALLED HAZARDOUS TO HEALTH

(By Michael L. Millenson)

WASHINGTON.—Not long after becoming Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, Dr. Frank Young gave enlarged replicas of his FDA inspector's badge to his boss, the secretary of Health and Human Services [HHS], and her chief of staff.

To Young, the gifts were "thank-yous" for the help that Secretary Margaret Heckler and the chief of staff, C. McClain Haddow, were giving him in running an agency whose responsibilities range from food, drugs and cosmetics to artificial hearts and computerized brain scanners.

To critics, however, the gifts symbolized what they see as the erosion of the FDA's traditional independence under the Reagan administration and the growing influence of politics on scientific decisions.

In particular, critics charge that intervention by HHS and the Federal Office of Management and Budget [OMB] has endangered public health in activities ranging from eating a salad at a restaurant and giving aspirin to a sick child to applying makeup:

Critics say it took congressional hearings spotlighting the death of a 10-year-old girl from an alleged allergic reaction to sulfites before the FDA proposed a limited ban on the preservative, often used to improve the appearance of fruit and vegetables in restaurants.

When studies showed that children taking aspirin for the flu could develop a potentially fatal disease called Reye's syndrome, pressure built for mandatory warnings on aspirin bottles. Aspirin makers disputed the studies, and the FDA decided to allow voluntary labeling, which critics now charge manufacturers are ignoring.

Although FDA scientists concluded that several dyes and colorings often used in cosmetics were weak carcinogens, HHS and OMB refused to allow the agency to ban their use, a congressional committee found.

In an unusual gesture, Dr. Alexander Schmidt, the FDA commissioner under President Richard Nixon, told state regulators recently, "We have more politicization of the agency than is either warranted by rational politics or good for the American people."

One particular target of critics' ire has been Haddow, a former aide to Sen. Orrin Hatch [R., Utah]. But Haddow, along with Young, vigorously denies that public health has been threatened in any way.

"We believe without question that science has to be left to the people at FDA," says Haddow, "But we think there's a role to play in the application of public policy to that science.

"Policy decisions that affect virtually every American deserve to have another level of review. . . . We think the American people have clearly said which philosophy should prevail [in that review]."

Adds Hatch: "It's the 'outs' complaining about the 'ins.' It's sour grapes."

To help assure a change in philosophy, a longstanding order giving the FDA commissioner semiautonomous authority was revoked soon after the Reagan administration took office in early 1981. Meanwhile, OMB, which is part of the executive office of the president, stepped up its oversight of the FDA under an executive order requiring an economic "cost-benefit" review of government regulations.

The new attention from HHS and OMB was evident when the FDA moved to ban six colorings and dyes found to cause cancer in animals. Although the additives seemed, at worst, to be weak carcinogens, the FDA concluded that the Delaney Clause, a federal law that forbids any use of a carcinogenic food additive, left them no choice.

Nevertheless, a proposed ban was rejected repeatedly by HHS, a report by the House Committee on Government Operations concluded. Meanwhile, an industry trade group attorney with ties to Vice President George Bush intervened with OMB. The FDA then was told that the administration opposed banning the additives, because they were unlikely to cause health problems.

"The administrative record contains no justification from department officials for not approving FDA's recommendations," the House committee said in a unanimous report. "It is likely that OMB played a major, if not pivotal role, in the continued, unlawful marketing of these dyes."

Complains Rep. Ted Weiss [D., N.Y.], chairman of a government operations subcommittee: "It's not up to the regulatory agency to say they don't like the law and, therefore, they've not going to adhere to it."

Both Republican and Democratic representatives, meanwhile, have asked hard questions about the FDA's slowness to ban the use of sulfite as a food preservative.

Since early 1983 the FDA has received reports of 21 deaths and more than 800 injuries allegedly caused by allergic reactions to sulfites. In August the agency finally proposed regulations that eventually will ban the preservative in fresh foods and vegetables.

Young insists that the FDA acted as quickly as scientific evidence would allow. "Sulfites was one of the fastest regulations ever to go through FDA and the department," he says.

Critics, however, contend the agency did not move until congressional hearings focused publicity on the death of 10-year-old Medaya McPike of Salem, Ore., who died earlier this year, allegedly from an allergic reaction to sulfites.

"It is sad, but true, that you need dead bodies and the glare of adverse publicity to overcome this administration's aversion to public health regulation," says Rep. John Dingell [D., Mich.], chairman of the sulfite hearings.

Adds an FDA insider who asked not to be identified: "Most of the [lag] time was spent trying to convince [HHS] that we had to have regulation, that people were dying."

The FDA's decision to use a voluntary approach with aspirin manfacturers regarding warning labels on bottles has provoked charges from critics that the action is not working.

In a recent letter to several senators, the American Academy of Pediatrics complained that the aspirin makers have reneged on their promise to post a clear warning about Reye's syndrome on the bottles in time for this winter's flu season. [The Aspirin Foundation of America disputes the charge.]

S. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter IX of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act is amended by adding at the end the following:

"APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

"SEC. 903. The Food and Drug Administration shall be headed by a Commissioner of Food and Drugs who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to individuals appointed to the office of Commissioner of Food and Drugs after the date of the enactment of this Act.

MYTH OF THE DAY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, the myth of the day is that the administration's budget will comply with the $144 billion deficit ceiling set in the Gramm-Rudman law. No doubt it will project a deficit of $144 billion or less as required. But will that projection be realistic or will it be a myth?

Their budget will be about as realistic as Tinker Bell. It will be filled with smoke-and-mirror savings, will-of-the-wisp cuts, and rosy economic projections. Such a budget may serve the administration's purpose in avoiding telling the American people bad news.

What do I mean by imaginary cuts and rosy projections? Look first at the so-called privatization proposals. There may be good reasons why some Government assets should be sold. Yet each of these proposals is certain to be a political hot potato. And Congress, acting in a bipartisan fashion, is likely to reject some if not all of the administration's recommendations. Other proposals, for example, ending the agricultural extension service, are likely to face the same fate.

Regarding rosy forecasts, the administration will likely say that GNP will grow by 4 percent next year after adjusting for inflation. The Congressional Budget Office will not be as optimistic, which means that the deficit will be still higher. Adding these factors together means that the administration's budget deficit will really be around $200 billion. That is the figure the Senate Budget Committee will have to work from.

In the past, Congress has often gone along with this charade, often adding a few frills of its own. But this year, a sequester order stands in the way of relying on mythical accounting as the administration will do.

Congress is going to have to be relatively honest in preparing a budget resolution. The smoke-and-mirrors cuts in the administration's budget will disappear. And to stay within the Gramm-Rudman ceiling, the Budget Committee will be forced to look elsewhere for an equal amount of savings. And elsewhere is likely to be the defense budget.

Imagine the pain. Senators who have been life-long advocates for defense will be forced to choose between politically popular domestic programs and defense. At this point, the administration's penchant for imaginary cuts will come home to roost.

This prospect is behind the calls for a quick grand compromise on the budget. If such a compromise is not reached and members of the Senate Budget Committee have to start voting on these tough choices, they will be unlikely to let the rest of us off the hook. If that happens the chances for a compromise later in the year—say, September—will be slim to none. That is why the administration's mythical budget may turn into a nightmare later in the year.

THE ORIGINS OF STAR WARS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, it is a story no one would believe without evidence. It is the story of the origins of the President's star wars message to the Nation. The biggest defense program potentially in the history of the world was conceived in a casual and intellectually uniformed manner that almost resists cogent explanation.

A President of the United States, enamored with the concept of a perfect defense against attack, decides to commit his Nation to a trillion dollar program without seeking even the most rudimentary assessment of his technical experts. And his staff, for whatever reasons they saw fit, served him by creating a screen of secrecy which prevented any evaluation of his plan or even significant modification of his language until the last minute.

Before the President's speech was there any consideration of the technical problems of star wars? Not according to a participant in these events. Was thought given to the military consequences of such a program? Again no. How about its effect on our allies? Not a word. And an assessment of the likely Soviet response? Again no consideration.

So here we have one of the key weapons decisions of all times being made in a political, technical, diplomatic, and one might argue, intellectual vacuum. It would be amusing to read of the "stunned, livid, outrage" of the top military and civilian advisers to the President when they discovered they had not been consulted were it not for the commonsense conclusion that they should have been.

I believe that the President's staff protected him from his advisers out of fear that his simple concept would have been ridiculed by his own experts—the same experts who you dutifully serve as proponents of the Star Wars Program.

Madam President, the history of the origins of the star wars concept has never been more thoroughly researched or documented than by Frank Greve of Knight-Ridder Newspapers. His accounting of this remarkable decision almost leaves the reader stunned in disbelief that so complex a matter could have been handled so cavalierly.

Madam President, I ask that Frank Greve's article titled "How Reagan's Plan Caught Many Insiders by Surprise," from the San Jose Mercury News be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW REAGAN'S PLAN CAUGHT MANY INSIDERS BY SURPRISE

(By Frank Greve)

WASHINGTON.—Secretary of State George P. Shultz was livid. He had just learned that President Reagan would announce a stunning change in the nation's nuclear warfare policy in two days.

It was a change that would immediately and unalterably be nicknamed "Star Wars," a change Shultz opposed because he considered it dangerous and, on technical grounds, impossible.

But Shultz had not been consulted, a Mercury News Washington Bureau examination of the origin of "Star Wars" reveals. He simply had been given a copy of Reagan's intended speech—an "eyes only" copy that Shultz could not share with Paul Nitze, the arms control adviser to Shultz and the president. Nitze first learned about "Star Wars" at 11 a.m. on the day of the speech, March 23, 1983.

Like Shultz, members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff got two days' warning. So did the Defense Department's top nuclear strategist, Assistant Secretary Richard N. Perle, who was so enraged at being blind-sided, according to an aide, that he "nearly fell on his sword."

Undersecretary Richard D. DeLauer, the chief Pentagon scientist, learned of the biggest, most ambitious weapons research program in history nine hours before its public announcement. Fred C. Ikle, the undersecretary of defense for policy, was notified at the same time, and he pleaded vainly for a chance to alert NATO leaders.

And so it went throughout the highest echelons of the Reagan administration. The "Star Wars" proposal, which pushed Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev toward the bargaining table in Geneva—and which now is the principal obstacle to new arms control agreements—came as a bolt from the blue.

That plan to knock out incoming Soviet ballistic missiles was conceived almost casually in 1983—but since then it has become so expensive it has no price tag, so complicated it has no due date. It also has become the biggest of the many differences between Reagan and Gorbachev on the eve of their Geneva summit.

"Whether strike weapons will make it to outer space or be barred from it is an all-important question," the Soviet leader said recently. "The answer to it is decisive to the course of developments in the world for many years ahead."

Yet the Strategic Defense Initiative, as "Star Wars" is officially named, was not a decision arrived at "after careful consultation with my advisers," as Reagan said when he announced the plan on national television. Rather, it was a decision made by Reagan and kept secret by him and a half-dozen National Security Council staff members from nearly everyone else, particularly the doubters, the Mercury News Washington Bureau examination found.

Many of the generals, aides, scientists, bureaucrats and appointees who know about the beginnings of "Star Wars" have retired. Some now consider it such a success that they are eager to chronicle its history and perhaps stake small claims to paternity. Others say they are appalled at what they consider folly's progress.

With significant exceptions, "Star Wars" participants still in government asked not to be identified, a request honored in this story. All details coming from unidentified sources were confirmed by at least one other participant.

AVOID OBSTACLES

The basic strategy, under a plan carried out by Robert C. McFarlane, then the president's deputy national security adviser, was to skirt Congress, the bureaucracy and the media. Those three sectors, the proponents reasoned, would smother the radical "Star Wars" idea in its crib if given a chance.

As a result, most top officials did not learn of the proposal until they had no choice but to back their boss, according to many of the principals. "If you supported Reagan, you supported SDI," one insider recalled recently, referring to "Star Wars" by its formal initials.

In reality, many insiders—including the Joint Chiefs of Staff, whom Reagan singled out twice in his speech as influential supporters—had reservations about "Star Wars'" technology, timing and cost. Nearly all of Reagan's official advisers considered fanciful his suggestion that the new technologies might "give us the means of rendering these nuclear weapons impotent and obsolete."

COULDN'T SUPPORT THAT

"Those of us who knew what was really going on couldn't support that," said DeLauer, now a private consultant. "It was an overstatement with regard to how it would protect cities and the assertion that the protection would be leak-proof."

"We recognized that SDI was not a panacea" against nuclear threats of all kinds, said retired Army Gen. John W. Vessey Jr., then chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. In fact the Joint Chiefs had urged the president to consider strategic defense, but they had no specific plan in mind, simply considering it a concept worth careful study.

Both proponents and opponents of "Star Wars" agree it was not carefully considered.

FIVE DAYS' WARNING

Nuclear physicist George A. Keyworth II, for example, chief scientific adviser to the president, received five days' warning of the "Star Wars" decision. He might have gotten less, according to an NSC member, "had not we asked ourselves, 'How can the president go on the tube directing a major high-technology initiative and tell his science adviser nothing?'"

So, McFarlane called Keyworth on Saturday, March 19, 1983, and asked one crucial question: Could Keyworth support stepped-up strategic defense research? Keyworth, without significant hesitation, said yes and was told to help draft the speech and build support within the scientific community.

His immediate reaction to the "Star Wars" idea was, "Give me time. It's big. Give me time," Keyworth said in a recent interview.

LET'S THINK SOME MORE

"Most people saw the speech very close to delivery, and most—myself included, incidentally—had the same reaction: "My God, let's think about this some more. Let's think about the implications for the allies. Let's think about what the Soviets are going to think. Let's think about what's technically feasible. Let's think about what the scientists are going to think. Let's think about the command and control problems.'"

They are formidable concerns. Under the system Reagan proposed, several layers of speed-of-light weapons, either space-based or with their beams reflected off space-based mirrors, would fire upon Soviet ICBMs as they rose off their launch pads and arched through space toward the United States or Western Europe.

A BALL ON THE MOON

In a Soviet first strike, the system would have to destroy, within half an hour of their launch, thousands of warheads. In each instance, the beam would have to be aimed so precisely, according to DeLauer, that the feat would be like spotlighting, from Earth, a basketball on the surface of the moon.

An important White House analyst involved in the decision was asked recently whether such technical problems had been examined before Reagan's speech.

"That was not an issue," he replied. "The idea was to make a decision and then make it happen."

What about whether "Star Wars," if it worked, would contribute to a sound military strategy?

"That wasn't considered either."

What about the likelihood that the Soviet Union would consider "Star Wars" threatening?

"As best I could tell, none of that was really thought through either."

NEVER CONSIDERED

What about the system's relation to the Outer Space Treaty (banning weapons in space) and the ABM, or Anti-Ballistic Missile treaty (limiting defenses against ballistic missiles)?

"That was never considered.

"None of the things you assume would be considered were considered at all. People just don't believe that the president could make such a momentous decision so impulsively. They think we must have thought through what it would do to the treaties and how it might work as a bargaining chip in Geneva, and so on, but I can't find it.

"Neither can anybody else who has undertaken a history of SDI, and the reason is, it isn't there."

Another participant said the decision was made "with little more consideration than you give to the jacks before you bounce the ball." A third source, marveling at how Reagan slipped the fetters of his bureaucracy, said, "It was a fabulous study of top-down leadership."

NO ONE CHALLENGED HIM

Another took a more critical view. "You'd think that if the president proposed something absolutely off-the-wall," he said, "there'd be someone who would stand up and say, 'That's screwy!'

"Well, there wasn't."

What there was, by the consensus of three eminent scientists who have briefed him, was a president with the scientific acumen of the average man on the street. They are not surprised that Reagan has muffed some basic strategic facts, appearing on one occasion to be unaware that the Soviets rely heavily on land-based missiles, and on another describing mobile missiles as possible first-strike weapons.

The scientists add, however, that Reagan is quicker than most top business executives to recognize the implications of scientific advances. And they say that Reagan, more than anyone else in his administration, is optimistic that scientific research can solve national security problems.

THE START OF AN IDEA

Reagan vividly encountered the strategic defense problem during a 1979 campaign visit to the North American Air Defense Command headquarters in Cheyenne, Wyo.

After observing NORAD radars tracking thousands of objects in space, including, he would later recall, an astronaut's glove, Reagan asked commanding Gen. Jim Hill what NORAD could do to stop an incoming Soviet missile.

"The answer was, 'Nothing,'" recalled Martin Anderson, an economic adviser who had accompanied Reagan.

So, Anderson drafted a campaign memo in August 1979 suggesting that Reagan propose construction of a protective missile shield against Soviet intercontinental ballistic missiles, perhaps exploiting laser beam technologies.

DIDN'T LIKE THE TIMING

A senior campaign adviser, Michael K. Deaver, said no. Deaver, who later would become deputy White House chief of staff, liked the idea but not the timing. He feared his candidate might look like a radical hawk if he proposed sharp changes in traditional nuclear doctrine.

Under that doctrine, called Mutually Assured Destruction, the superpowers have maintained nuclear peace by restricting defensive weapons and leaving themselves virtually naked to nuclear attack. The theory has been that the threat of retaliation produces a defensive effect.

Reagan has never liked this idea, calling it, privately, "a Mexican standoff."

"He said it was like two men with nuclear pistols pointed at each other's heads, and if one man's finger flinches, you're going to get your brains blown out," recalled retired Air Force Lt. Gen. Daniel Graham, a defense adviser to Reagan in 1976 and 1980. "He said it didn't make any sense to him."

TECHNOLOGICAL SUPERIORITY

Graham, a former head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, favored space-based defense. As he explained in an October 1980 U.S. News & World Report interview, "The kind of superiority we should seek is technological superiority—that is, to have some of our military capabilities in an area where the Soviets, with inadequate technology, cannot challenge us. . . . If we challenge them in a technical way—such as with a space-borne defense system—and make them face an entirely different military equation, we can quickly restore the balance."

After the election, Graham founded the Washington-based think tank "High Frontier" to promote space-based defenses against Soviet ICBMs.

KITCHEN CABINET'S ROLE

Four members of the president's Kitchen Cabinet initially were contributors to Graham's effort: brewer Joseph Coors, 68; paper magnate Karl R. Bendetsen, 78; investor and rancher William A. Wilson, 71; and foods magnate Jacquelin Hume, 80. All are influential supporters, not only of Reagan, but of Stanford University's Hoover Institution on War, Peace and Revolution, the nation's premier conservative think tank.

In 1981, a senior scientist from the Hoover Institution approached science adviser Keyworth and said he wanted to offer his technical expertise to the president's well-meaning friends.

The scientist was nuclear physicist Edward Teller, 77, father of the hydrogen bomb and Keyworth's mentor. Teller, whom Keyworth described in an interview as "my father," had pushed Keyworth for the science adviser job.

TELLER'S FEARS

Like Reagan, Teller has the gravest fear of Soviet intentions. Like Reagan, he considers the ABM treaty, which limits defensive weapons against ICBMs, a mistake that has undermined U.S. security.

Teller believes that "the old MAD policy of mutual assured destruction is nonsense" and that "MAD is not only morally bankrupt, it is rapidly getting technically bankrupt."

Guided by Teller, the four Kitchen Cabinet members split from Graham and High Frontier. Thereafter, they used their influence to promote four meetings between Reagan and Teller before the "Star Wars" speech. Teller would not comment on the sessions. "If the President will tell you, then I will comment on it," he said.

EXCALIBUR

Teller proposed to build an X-ray laser powered by a nuclear detonation. Called "Excalibur" in tests, the device would pick off Soviet ICBMs with powerful X-ray beams created by a controlled bomb-scale explosion in the weapon's core. It might be fired from a space-based platform or from a ground station, its beams reflected off orbiting mirrors.

In a Sept. 14, 1982, meeting with the president, Teller warned, according to two sources who were present, that the Soviet Union was developing an X-ray laser weapon similar to "Excalibur."

"Because the Soviets are doing it, by now it is a question of life or death" be explained in a recent interview.

Like Graham, Teller was not thinking of the weapon in strictly defensive terms. "Excalibur," he promised the president after his speech, "would end the MAD era and commence a period of assured survival on terms favorable to the Western alliance."

NOT FIRST APPEAL

It was not the first time Reagan had heard such an appeal and warning. In January 1982, Kitchen Cabinet members Coors, Hume and Bendetsen had proposed an ABM system using directed energy weapons. Accounts of that meeting reveal much of Reagan's thinking about strategic defense.

Reagan wondered, for example, whether the system should be designed to protect missile silos or populations. (Protecting hardened silos is a relatively easy task called "point defense," protecting cities and civilians is a much more demanding job called "area defense.")

"Bendetsen told him that if you could do one, you could do the other, but that the cost and time would be very different," recalled a source present at the meeting. "He said it was a question that was not answerable by thinking of cost alone and said that, if he had the president's permission and it were up to him, whatever the answer, it should be secret.

"Whatever the case, Bendetsen said, it was too early to make a distinction between city protection and silo protection and we ought to get on with it."

The president answered, "You're right," said the source, whose account was independently confirmed.

ISSUE QUICKLY DISMISSED

The question of how to deal with existing ABM and space treaties was quickly dismissed. Reagan appeared satisfied when Bendetsen stated, "So many people on your staff and State and committees on the Hill will be endlessly involved in those questions that it is more constructive for you to pursue the means that are involved."

Bendetsen, retired chairman of Champion International Corp., was an undersecretary of the Army between 1946 and 1952. he recommended that Reagan announce in a nationwide speech a quest, like the 1942 Manhattan Project that produced the atomic bomb, to develop new speed-of-light weaponry for strategic defense.

To do that, Reagan replied, he would need that recommendation from the Defense Department.

"Sir," said Bendetsen, "if it is going to come from the Secretary of Defense, you're going to have to talk him into it."

GOOD NEWS, BAD NEWS

In February 1983, Gen. Vessey had the kind of good news/bad news problem that sometimes befalls chairmen of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He and Reagan got on so well that the president had recently instituted monthly meetings with the Joint Chiefs. Now the problem was, Vessey couldn't decide what to talk about. He called the chiefs to his office on a Saturday morning.

"We decided we didn't want to just tell him readiness was up and so forth," a participant recalled. "We wanted to bring the president something new, different and exciting."

Adm. James Watkins, chief of naval operations, had an idea. Reading from notes, Watkins told the chiefs that it was time to consider the possibility that new technologies would make it possible to defend against a Soviet ICBM attack.

Gradually, in careful consultation with NATO allies, the United States should pursue the weapons technology advantage it had over the Soviet Union, Watkins suggested, according to notes that survived the session.

CALLED A MORAL ANSWER

A devout Catholic deeply involved at the time in the church's nuclear ethics debate, Watkins said it was more moral to protect Americans from nuclear attack than to hold them hostage to Soviet intentions under the MAD doctrine.

"Wouldn't it be better to save lives than to avenge them?" he asked.

And where had Watkins' idea come from? "If there was a father of the idea in Adm. Watkins' mind, it was Dr. Teller," an important aide said.

Between October 1982 and January 1983, Teller and Watkins had met "a number of times," the aide said, "And it was Dr. Teller who brought the technical information to Watkins that got him so interested in SDI."

Teller confirmed the exchange but stressed that Watkins had initiated it. Watkins declined to be interviewed. In the same 1982-83 period, according to several sources, Watkins had also met informally with McFarlane.

VAGUE AND PHILOSOPHIC

Still, on Feb. 11, when the Joint Chiefs met in the Roosevelt Room with the president, their strategic defense idea was vague and philosophic in tone. They did not distinguish between protecting cities and protecting missile silos or between space-based and ground-based defenses. They put the subject low on their agenda, considering it worthy, some day, of further study. "Our recommendation was that we move into the defensive in the long run," Vesey recalled recently.

"The next step, we figured would be to put a group together and see what was feasible and what the alternatives were," Army chief of staff Gen. E.C. "Shy" Meyer explained in an interview.

Administration accounts of the session say that the Joint Chiefs were polled on the feasibility of strategic defense, that they concurred, and that Reagan drew the determination to act from their counsel, Vesey and Meyer, in recent interviews, could not recall such a polling. Neither could others present.

REAGAN PERKED UP

As far as the Joint Chiefs were concerned, the session with Reagan had gone well, particularly when he "perked up," as one participant put it, for Watkins' strategic defense briefing.

Reagan's recollection is somewhat different. "Well, the whole thing started right in our Cabinet Room," he told U.S. News & World Report recently. "That was when, meeting with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, I brought up the question that nuclear weapons were the first weapons in the history of man that had not led to the creation of a defense system to protect against them. I asked if it was worthwhile looking into this. Is it possible to come up with a defense? They were all agreed it was. And right there the program was given birth."

Reagan, it appears, seized on the Joint Chiefs' strategic defense idea as an endorsement of his own leanings. He plainly fell for Watkins' rhetorical figure, "Wouldn't it be better to save lives than to avenge them?" But when Reagan used the line in his "Star Wars" speech six weeks later, it had an expanded meaning. He meant to use space-based weapons that would protect cities as well as missile silos.

PULL SOMETHING TOGETHER

Unknown to the chiefs, within hours after they met with Reagan, McFarlane assigned three National Security Council staff members, all senior Air Force officers, to think about strategic defense.

McFarlane "told them he had the seeds of something, could they pull something together on strategic defense," according to a well-placed source.

They were to propose various options for strategic defense and weigh for each of them "the implications for the president's MX, B-1, Trident 2 and Pershing programs; probable international reactions; where support might come from."

What led Reagan to act, at that moment, remains a mystery. McFarlane makes it a practice not to discuss his dealings with the president, and Reagan has said only, "I made the decision." What he enjoyed most about the "Star Wars" idea, he has said, was that it provided "a vision of the future that offers hope."

PROBLEM WEAPONS

He needed that in March 1983. One embattled offensive missile, the MX, couldn't find a home; his promised deployment of Pershing 2 and ground-launched cruise missiles in Europe had helped spawn an intimidating peace movement at home and abroad; U.S. Catholic bishops, who had tentatively found nuclear warfare immoral, threatened to make the anti-nuclear movement a mainstream crusade.

Congress, to make matters worse, appeared ready to cut by half the growth of the defense budget, and a popular nuclear freeze resolution loomed.

Reagan had contributed to the clamor, attacking communism as "the focus of evil in modern world" in an address March 8 in Orlando, Fla. Pending nuclear freeze proposals, he said, ignored "the aggressive impulses of an evil empire."

LONG-RANGE HOPE

Shortly after the Orlando speech, the NSC staffers working on the "Star Wars" concept got new orders. They were to provide the content for the last five minutes of a speech Reagan planned to deliver on March 23 to promote his embattled 10 percent defense budget increase.

Specifically, the staffers were to provide some uplift. "The president wanted legitimately to offer some long-range hope because the rest of the speech was to be about the bucks required for his defense buildup," an informed source recalled.

"He wanted to say that, long-range, there was a prospect of real peace, and that the shift toward defensive systems offered us the possibility of resolving the nuclear dilemma."

THE ANNEX

The NSC staff members worked in the highest secrecy on a speech insert they nicknamed "The Annex." Scrap paper and drafts went into burn bags for disposal. No contact was permitted with speech writers of the remainder of the president's address, let alone anyone outside the White House. Defense Department experts were excluded because "they leak over there," one "Star Wars" analyst explained.

Outside scientific advisers were excluded, too, Keyworth said, "because if the president had gone outside the White House to solicit people for opinions, you've got to admit we would have had the leak of the month to say the least."

Had they not been excluded, the president might have heard daunting news.

DUBIOUS REPORT

A panel of experts from the White House Science Council had produced for Keyworth in January 1983 a highly classified report on exotic weapons technologies. The report was characterized by several sources as dubious about the military applicability of all of them, including chemical lasers and particle beams. The advisers deemed Teller's X-ray laser project to be the most promising technology, but still very remote from weapons applications.

"The report never went beyond Dr. Keyworth" in the formative period of SDI deliberations, according to an authoritative source. Keyworth said, in an interview, that all he believed the president to be proposing was a further examination of new technologies that might be useful in strategic defense.

SPEECH VAGUE, CONFUSED

Meanwhile, within NSC and the White House Situation Room, efforts to draft the "Star Wars" speech ran afoul of vagueness and confusion.

"The language of the drafts fluctuated from urgency to leisure in intent," according to one participant. "It ranged from, 'It might be a good idea to begin thinking about. . . .' to, 'As of tonight, I have directed . . .' followed by the High Frontier approach. On the one side, they were saying, we have the answer today, and on the other they were trying to stuff that widget back in the box."

This sawing back and forth intensified in the final days as selected officials received drafts, then weighed in with protests and amendments to McFarlane and Reagan. In several instances, the protests produced important changes in the final speech.

NARROW THE FOCUS

For example, arms control expert Perle managed to narrow the focus of the strategic defense concept to protection against a Soviet ballistic missile attack. Otherwise, Soviet bombers and cruise missiles would have been included, dramatically increasing the complexity and cost of a strategic defense for the United States, let alone Western Europe.

Continued vulnerability to Soviet bombers and cruise missiles is often cited as the flaw in Reagan's pledge that strategic defense would "give us the means of rendering these nuclear weapons impotent and obsolete."

Once they finally learned of the "Star Wars" decision, Perle, phoning from a NATO conference in Lisbon, Portugal, and Shultz, in two hastily arranged meetings with Reagan, argued that his speech was unduly provocative. According to authoritative sources, they foresaw the instant Soviet Nightmare that a U.S. first strike might destroy most Soviet ICBMs, and a "Star Wars" defense would prevent retaliation with the remainder.

NO ONE WANTS THAT

Their arguments led to this Reagan assurance: "I clearly recognize that defensive systems have limitations and raise certain problems and ambiguities. If paired with offensive systems, they can be viewed as fostering an aggressive policy, and no one wants that."

Perle also sought to reassure NATO allies. He knew what the speech writers had overlooked: that Western Europe lies within six minutes of Soviet missiles, giving NATO allies a different, tougher defense problem than the United States faces.

This produces some soothing phrases and this awkward sentence in Reagan's speech: "Tonight, consistent with our obligations under the ABM treaty and recognizing the need for closer consultation with our allies, I'm taking an important first step."

That first step, as Reagan phrased it, was "a comprehensive and intensive effort to define a long-term research-and-development program to begin to achieve our ultimate goal of eliminating the threat posed by strategic nuclear missiles." If that appeared vague, it was a reflection of the uncertainty among the "Star Wars" advisers and speech writers.

CONSOLIDATE PROGRAMS

The speech also reflected the concerns of the joint chiefs that "Star Wars" not interfere with their acquisition of new offensive strategic or conventional hardware. Their influence appeared more powerful the following day when White House briefers explained that "Star Wars" would be a consolidation of existing research programs, not a Manhattan Project, and that no new spending for research were foreseen in 1983 and 1984.

"So they were talking about the out years," concluded Gen. Meyer, then the Army's chief of staff. "I've always thought that was funny money." Not on his watch would "Star Wars" hurt the Army.

Meyer has since had his doubts, he admitted, whether the system would work. "Whether 'Star Wars' is naive or not, I don't know," Meyer said. "It's naive to critics, but Reagan did what a leader does. He waves toward the horizon instead of toward the ground."

ANDROPOV DISAGREED

Then-Soviet Premier Yuri V. Andropov disagreed. He warned of a new arms race and concluded, "The issues of war and peace must not be treated so flippantly."

Teller first learned of the president's decision when the speech was piped into a White House dinner to which he, the Joint Chiefs and leading scientists had been invited.

Teller's delight faded some weeks later when the administration dropped space-based X-ray lasers into low priority in its strategic defense plans.

Among administration officials, only Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger had backed "Star Wars" from the start. "Anything the president wants is OK with Weinberger," defense scientist DeLauer asserted recently.

IS IT A BOMB?

But Weinberger was to make an unsettling discovery.

One day, as they headed toward a "Star Wars" congressional hearing, Weinberger had turned to DeLauer and asked about the X-ray laser: "Is it a bomb?"

"I had to tell him," DeLauer recalled recently. "That's how you're going to get the X-ray. You're going to have to detonate a nuclear bomb in space."

Weinberger appeared disappointed. He repeated his question: "It's not a bomb, is it?"

DeLauer, tactfully, said no, it would be a "nuclear event."

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 12 noon, with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

CIVIL LITIGATION

Mr. McCONNELL. Madam President, on November 1, 1985, I noted the serious problem we face from the runaway cost of civil litigation in the United States. In connection with that statement, I urged greater use of alternative dispute resolution techniques in an effort to move away from the unreasonable reliance on lawsuits to resolve, it sometimes seems, every conceivable problem.

During the recent adjournment, I read a fine article by Mr. James J. Kilpatrick, published in the Louisville, KY, Courier-Journal on November 28, 1985. Mr. Kilpatrick's column noted that the U.S. Supreme Court has recently, in his words, "struck a blow for sanity" when it imposed a fine of $1,000 on a lawyer who pursued a frivolous lawsuit.

I believe Mr. Kilpatrick's comments regarding the need for a more sensible approach toward civil litigation, and the need to impose greater responsibility on attorneys and litigants alike, are commendable, and I ask unanimous consent that his column be printed in full in today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOOSIER'S HIGH-COURT FINE COULD SLOW THE RUSH TO SUE

By James J. Kilpatrick

WASHINGTON.—Chief Justice Warren Earl Burger struck a blow for sanity the other day. He persuaded four of his colleagues to join him in levying a $1,000 fine on John Hyde of Hammond, Ind. The summary punishment was imposed for abuse of the judicial process—more specifically, for pursuing a frivolous lawsuit.

Three cheers for the chief, and for Justices Byron White, Lewis Powell, William Rehnquist and Sandra Day O'Connor too! If the word would get around in our litigious society that the patience of judges at some point can be exhausted, we might hope for a break in the nationwide logjam of litigation.

Hyde's particular obsession has to do with paper currency. He believes firmly that the founding fathers intended the dollar to be fixed in value by its relation to the Spanish doubloon. The Constitution prohibits the states from making anything but gold and silver legal tender. Surely the same prohibition applies to the Federal Government. Therefore a $100 bill is not legal tender, and the gentleman brought suit to prove it.

His crusade ended abruptly on Nov. 18, when the Supreme Court threw out his suit and hit him with the $1,000 fine. Justice William Brennan, joined by Justices Thurgood Marshall and John Stevens, objected that the majority had acted arbitrarily, but arbitrary actions are nothing new around the high court. It is high time that some brakes were applied to nonsensical litigation.

Consider a few examples. In Clearwater, Fla., last March, the father of 17-year-old twin girls sued the Pinellas County School Board. His daughters would have tied for top honors in the graduating class of Seminole High School if the board had given them credit for a class in band. The board unanimously refused. "I'll soon," cited the father, and he did.

In Santa Rosa, Calif., a 15-year-old girl bought a new red dress to wear to the senior prom. Her 18-year-old date spent several hundred dollars having his Corvett repainted to match the color. Then the school superintendent ruled that the girl, a ninth-grader, couldn't attend the prom because ninth-graders aren't allowed. The teenagers' parents sought an injunction to force the school to let the couple attend. The school's insurance adjuster settled for $4,500 to cover dress, paint job and mental anguish.

In Bend, Ore., an indignant customer sued McDonald's, the golden-arches people, for $1,000 in damages. He contended that the restaurant refused to serve him breakfast at 10:25 a.m., though it advertised breakfast service until 10:30. County District Judge Ed Perkins threw the case out of court.

In Cleveland, an associate professor of political science compiled a study ranking American cities in terms of their "quality of life." He gave the city of Tulsa, Okla., poor marks. The city went into U.S. District Court and sued the professor for $26 million in damages.

When grievances are real and substantial, and cannot be settled by negotiation or arbitration, an injured party has every right to seek redress in court. That elemantary proposition scarcely needs to be defended. But the courts ought not to be used, or abused, by publicity-seeking litigants. Things have reached a point at which "Let's Soon" is about to replace the national motto.

The United States has more lawyers per capita—far more lawyers per capita—than any nation in the world, and most of them stay busy. To the extent that they serve to preserve a rule of law, fine! To the extent that they burden the courts with trivial pursuits, they do a disservice to their profession. If the $1,000 fine imposed on the Indiana goldbug gives pause to these frivolous folks, maybe our courts will gain time to spend on issues that count.

ADDED FLOOD DAMAGE PREVENTED BY WATER PROJECTS

Mr. MATHIAS. Madam President, as many of my colleagues know, many areas of Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia experienced heavy flooding of their rivers due to tropical storm Juan, last November. The resulting damage to these areas and the suffering of the residents, as great as it was, could have been worse. What prevented a much greater disaster was the many dams and levees on and along the rivers of this region.

People often summarily dismiss water projects such as these as simply serving the interest of a few at the expense of the general taxpayer. The experience in the recent flooding shows us that this is not the case. The attached articles from the Cumberland Times and Cumberland News underscore how invaluable these projects prove to be in the times of potential disaster, both in monetary and human terms. The articles point out that Federal flood protection prevented more than $167 million in damage in this three-State area and relate how the Bloomington Dam itself held back enough water to prevent an astounding $113 million in damage. The benefits in human terms are immeasurable.

It is because of the foresight of past Members of Congress such as Senators J. Glenn Beall and Jennings Randolph, and Representatives Goodloe Bryon, and Harley Staggers, that we were able to prevent the further suffering of today's inhabitants of these regions.

I commend the two articles to my colleagues and ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Cumberland News, Nov. 16, 1985]

ADDED FLOOD DAMAGE PREVENTED BY PROJECTS

Preliminary estimates indicate that flood protection projects constructed in the Potomac River basin by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' Baltimore District prevented more than $167 million in damages during and after rainfall from Storm Juan last week.

The announcement was made Friday by Col. Martin W. Walsh Jr., Baltimore District engineer.

"Last week's heavy rains caused considerable flooding and damage in the Potomac and Shenandoah river basins," Col. Walsh said. "Look at the devastation along the South Branch of the Potomac, and imagine what the damages would have been like on the Potomac's North Branch and main stem without our flood control projects in place," he said.

During the week of Nov. 3, Corps projects were pressed into service to hold back rising water which otherwise would have flooded property had the projects not been there.

Bloomington Dam, which the Corps built on the North Branch of the Potomac River along the Maryland-West Virginia state line, prevented an estimated $113 million in damages. "In this one event, Bloomington came close to paying two-thirds of its contruction cost of $175 million," said Ken Hartzell of the Baltimore District's Planning Division. The Corps completed Bloomington Dam in 1982.

In Garrett County, the Savage River Dam also saved considerable property from damage. Started by the Works Progress Administration (WPA) in 1939 but finished by the Corps in 1952 this $6.4 million dam prevented an estimated $28.3 million in damages. Although the Upper Potomac River Commission of Maryland maintains the dam, the Corps regulates it during periods of flooding.

Corps-built local flood protection projects on the North Branch above and below Bloomington Dam also prevented significant damages. Baltimore District officials estimate that the Cumberland and Ridgeley, W. Va. flood control project, which cost $21 million to build, saved an estimated $23 million in damages to those towns, which are 40 miles downstream from Bloomington.

Two flood protection projects on the North Branch upstream from Bloomington also produced sizable savings. The Corps estimates that levees at Bayard, W. Va., which cost $347,000 to build, prevented $540,000 in damages last week.

At Kitzmiller, another levee project, costing $600,000 to build, saved an estimated $2.5 million in flood damages.

The Corps has two types of flood control projects in the Potomac basin. Local flood protection units, which consist of levees, floodwalls and the like, allow a greater amount of water to pass through an area by increasing the height of the surrounding banks.

Dams and reservoirs are used to retain excess water until it can be released safely downstream.

Monetary benefits credited to Corps flood protection projects are determined by computing what river stages would have occurred if there had been no projects in the area and relating these stages to the corresponding acreage which would have been inundated. A dollar value is then assigned to the projected damage prevented because of the projects.

The Bloomington and Savage River Dams were able to reduce even more flow than usual because the Corps of Engineers-constructed Bloomington Dam was drawn well below its normal, or summer pool, level last week to permit workers access to a service road located adjacent to the dam, said Russell Newman, reservoir manager at Bloomington Lake.

When the heavy rains inundated this area, the pool was 50 feet below its standard level. Rainwater pushed that level to almost 20 feet above the normal pool.

"This was the flood of record of the North Branch Basin," he said, adding the dams played a role in reducing the massive volume of water which hit the basin.

During the storm, flows above the dam ranged up to 50,000 cubic feet per second at Kitzmiller. The Corps waited until the Potomac River crested at Paw Paw and then began releasing dam water which reduced the flow to about 200 cubic feet per second.

"We calculated that this reduced the level of flood stage at Luke by more than 12 feet and at Cumberland by more than 14 feet. At Cumberland that would have been equivalent to a 100-year storm and at Luke to the severity of a 500-year storm," Newman said.

"Normally speaking we don't claim much affect on flood control below Cumberland but in this flood it was demonstrated we did. Now the people of Paw Paw would question that. Their flood stage was 24 feet and the river crested at about 56 feet. But the dam reduced the overall flow by 2.4 feet and as far as Hancock it reduced it by three feet and 2.9 feet at Shepherdstown, W.Va.," he added.

"To people at Paw Paw who were already wet it probably didn't mean much. But it does if it kept the flow just below flood stage," Newman said.

Newman said the reservoir level is now again about 55 feet below standard level to permit work on a service road.

Dams also reduced the flow of rivers in West Virginia, said Jim Dove, state engineer for the Soil Conservation Service there.

"None of the SCS flood control dams were washed-out and none went over the top," he said Friday.

The SCS built and manages 64 dams in the Potomac drainage including 23 on the South Fork north near Moorefield.

Dove said the dams held 10 billion gallons of water which otherwise would have rushed down the river.

"It would have washed-out places like Maysville, Keyser and Brandywine," Dove said.

"We've built more than 150 dams in West Virginia and as far as we know all of the dams are still in place and are now drained and ready for any other rain," the West Virginia SCS engineer said.

DAMS PROVE WORTH IN NOVEMBER FLOOD

Ever since the Savage River Dam went into operation in 1952, the control of the release of water during periods of much rainfall and flooding of the North Branch of the Potomac River has prevented millions of dollars of property damage downstream.

In fact, figures compiled by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers have shown that this one dam has paid for itself many times in flood curtailment alone. During this one flood alone, the use of the dam, which cost $6.4 million to build, as a retainer of water prevented an estimated $28.3 million in damages.

Then, after being protected by this dam for three decades, the Bloomington Dam was constructed by the Army Engineers, the largest impoundment of its kind in eastern United States.

The real worth of this project which took ten years to complete was measured in the Nov. 4-5 flood of the Potomac River. The Corps estimates Bloomington Dam held back enough water to prevent an estimated $113 million in damages, a figure that is about two-thirds of the amount the dam cost, $175 million.

What made the Bloomington Dam more effective in this flood of record was its low pool, 50 feet below the spillway because of the drought from Aug. 24 to the early part of October. Another of the dam's functions and also that of Savage River Dam is to augment the flow of the North Branch of the Potomac River during dry periods. The very dry summer took much of the water in both impoundments to maintain a constant flow.

In severe dry periods and in times of above normal rainfall, the Army Corps of Engineers regulates the release of water from these two reservoirs.

The effective use of these two dams had a tremendous effect on communities downstream, in fact, a very dramatic effect on places such as Luke where the flood level was reduced by more than 12 feet and at Cumberland by more than 14 feet. That prevented what is termed a 500-year flood at Luke and a 100-year flood at Cumberland.

The Corps noted that while residents downriver from Cumberland will doubt the effect the dams had, the flood level was reduced 2.4 feet at Paw Paw, three feet at Hancock and 2.9 feet at Shepherdstown, W. Va., notwithstanding the tremendous flow of the South Branch entering the main stream at Green Spring.

The Army Corps of Engineers has to be given much credit for these dams and their regulation. But even greater credit must be given to those Cumberland men with foresight back as early as the late 1920s and during the 1930s for their endeavors in seeking a dam on the Savage River to reduce the damages that occurred so frequently in the Queen City.

The very dedicated group of citizens who worked for flood control projects succeeded in getting the first dam started as a Workers Progress Administration project in 1939. It was half built by the time World War II suspended the job, but through the efforts of these leaders in Allegany County and their legislators the Corps of Army Engineers finished it in 1952.

Time and time again residents downstream have appreciated the work of these men and agencies for building Savage River Dam and now much more so when we see the benefits of the much larger Bloomington Dam.

In recalling the long Congressional trails these two dams required, recognition must go to the work of the late Sixth Maryland District Representative and U.S. Senator Glenn Beall and his West Virginia constituents, retired former Second District Representatives Harley O. Staggers Sr. and Jennings Randolph, the latter who served in the U.S. Senate with Sen. Beall.

The dedication of all those connected with the two dams must be appreciated by those today who benefit from their efforts.

Today we concentrate on flood prevention or curtailment, but one of the other main uses of the two dams is maintaining a constant flow of water in the river. That has been one of the major reasons why the Luke Mill of Westvaco has modernized and expanded to become the largest industry in the tri-state region.

As time goes on residents of this section will see the benefits of water from Savage River Dam for municipal supplies and from both dams for industry in the Potomac River Valley.

THE U.S. STAKE IN THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. MELCHER. Madam President, next week on February 7 the people of the Philippines go to the polls to vote in the first Presidential election in years to determine the future of their republic.

I believe it is clear to Americans and Filipinos alike that the time has come for changes in their government to turn around the growing economic hardships, the military abuses, and the use of extraordinary constitutional powers to restrict individual freedoms.

For the past 18 months or longer, relations with the Philippines have been misguided. The State Department has blocked sales of wheat, dairy products, and other goods while orchestrating a chorus of charges of corruption about the election process and the principals involved. Further, the State Department, in pursuit of their ill-defined policy of goals and objectives, has alienated Filipinos and damaged United States producers. This course loses sight of the objectives of the election itself. We are focusing too closely on February 7 and not enough on February 8 and beyond.

While the end of the Marcos 20-year regime appears to be desirable, it is a decision for the Filipinos to make—not for the United States to dictate. We do have a vital stake in the outcome of the election. Paramount in United States vital interests are the strategic location of the Philippines for United States trade and military bases and neither of these interests is served by the nitty-gritty of political partisanship.

Retaining our strategic military bases at Subic Bay and Clark Air Force Base is essential regardless of who will lead that Pacific nation. There are no worthy substitute base locations in any other islands of the far western rim of the Pacific.

For trade, the United States dominates the Pacific rim and the gateway to Southeast Asian trade in the Philippines. With 54 million persons, it is the leading market for U.S. agricultural products—especially wheat—and manufactured products which, over the past 3 years, have been reduced by a third.

Buttressing the strategic and trade alliances dating back to the turn of the century are the strong and historic United States-Philippine cultural ties.

The slippage in United States-Philippine relations in recent years is the result of persistent meddling by the U.S. State Department in the long-standing trade and economic policies between our two countries. It is this inconsistency that is resented by the Filipinos and, at the same time, is damaging to United States producers—especially farmers and ranchers—whose products are exported to Southeast Asian markets.

Whatever internal changes the State Department is promoting in the Philippines, our job as Americans is to mend our vital military, trade and cultural alliances regardless of the outcome of the election.

In a country where political activities are part of family life, more than 80 percent of the voters will be at the polls. Make no mistake; Filipinos will vote to improve their lot—economically, socially, and politically—as they see it. Both sides campaign with money and promises funneled through their party structures. On February 5 all compaigning ceases so that the voters can reflect on this most important election of their lives.

The Philippine electorate may split their ballots, choosing the president of one party and the vice president of the other party. In some areas of the country, opposition vice presidential candidate Salvador Laurel is more attractive as the logical successor to the ailing Marcos than Marcos' running mate, the 75-year-old Arturo Tolentino, the former foreign minister. A significant number of voters may view the experienced Laurel as a satisfactory bridge of change from Marcos to a new president, viewing the election of Laurel as a worthy successor to a retiring or incapacitated Marcos.

But whatever the election results in the Philippines, the vital interests of the United States can only be served by a resumption of the strong ties between our two countries. The strategic location, trade opportunities, and cultural ties of our two peoples will not, and should not, be altered or taken hostage by the outcome of this important exercise in democracy.

TRIBUTE TO EDIE HUGGINS

Mr. SPECTER. Madam President, on Thursday evening, January 30, 1986, Edie Huggins, news reporter, commentator, show hostess, and director of community affairs for WCAU-TV, channel 10, Philadelphia, will be honored by her colleagues and fellow workers at channel 10 for more than 20 years of outstanding service to the station and to Philadelphia.

Ms. Huggins has brought a rare blend of professional competence and unusual sensitivity to the many on-air roles she has so successfully essayed. Her grace, charm, and obvious sincerity in countless telecasts have won her the affection of millions of viewers in the Delaware Valley over the past two decades.

It is altogether fitting that Ms. Huggins receive the encomiums of her colleagues as well as the plaudits of a grateful public on the occasion of her 20th anniversary with WCAU-TV.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, in her capacity as a Senator from Kansas, asks unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

HIGHER EDUCATION INVESTMENT PLAN

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, George Washington, in his first message to Congress, said: "Knowledge is to every country the surest basis of public happiness."

The Congress would do well to heed Washington's words this year as it examines severe new limits on Government spending and considers proposals for a better Tax Code.

Higher education is one of the best, most cost-effective investments for securing the future of our Nation. The Federal student loan and grant programs have proven very effective in assuring every able student access to higher education and choice in higher education. These Federal programs have permanently changed the higher education landscape of the Nation and are serving our country well.

Although I would prefer, and will support, continued full funding of the direct aid and loan programs, I recognize that escalating costs are higher education's worst enemy. Thus I reluctantly anticipate, under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Reduction Act, significant adjustments and limitations on these Federal assistance programs in the years immediately ahead.

Educators and legislators should recognize that Federal student aid in an era of deficit reduction will be increasingly targeted toward the lowest income students and will leave others with fewer options. The challenge we must meet, if we are to develop the creativity and talent of all our young people, is to assure continued access to higher education for all able students.

With the long view in mind, the Citizens League of Baltimore conducted a thorough 2-year study of additional ways to help students and their families pay for higher education. Based on this study, the Citizens League has recommended a higher education investment plan that is practical, administratively simple, and economically sound.

Under this plan, individuals who set aside up to $2,000 per year per student beneficiary for educational purposes would be allowed a corresponding income tax deferral. This is the same kind of tax relief now accorded individual retirement accounts. The funds would not be taxed until after the student has graduated, and then the funds would be taxed as income to the beneficiary over a 10-year period in equal parts.

The distinctive feature of this education savings account plan is that it would benefit those who cannot save as well as those who can. Five percent of the total saved in each account would be placed in that State's scholarship pool for needy students. Taxes on this amount would be forgiven entirely.

In a time of contracting Government support for higher education, this 5-percent contribution could place millions of new dollars in State scholarship pools the year after the plan goes into operation, long before any student beneficiaries would draw from the individual accounts. In Maryland, for example, calculations show that if only half of the eligible families or individuals participated in the plan during its first year of operation, the State scholarship fund would increase by $11.3 million.

The education savings account plan I am introducing will:

Provide incentives for saving;

Defer taxes on principal and earnings for the investor;

Benefit many people in addition to those who can afford to save;

Make new scholarship funds available through tax-exempt contributions; and thereby

Provide additional funds to students who are otherwise unable to finance their education.

The incentives in this bill encourage financially able families to act in the public interest by assuming greater responsibility for financing their children's higher education. This proposal is basically a self-help plan that will maintain the opportunity for access and choice in higher education.

Those who have confidence enough in the future to save to finance education should be able to expect this limited Government incentive. Investments for higher education should be treated in a manner similar to other capital investments or to investments in individual retirement plans.

When we invest a dollar in higher education, we are investing in America's future. We are buying this Nation something it sorely needs. The benefits of higher education accrue to the entire society and not merely to individual students.

Young people today make up only two-fifths of our population, but the whole of our future will lie in their hands. We must act now to assure that higher education will not be out of their reach.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and the recommendation of the Citizens League of Baltimore, together with tabular material, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2024

CITIZENS LEAGUE OF BALTIMORE HIGHER EDUCATION INVESTMENT PLAN

THE PLAN

Amend the U.S. Internal Revenue Code to allow an annual income tax deduction to individuals of up to $2,000 per beneficiary for amounts invested in a Higher Education Investment Plan. The $2,000 maximum allowable amount would be indexed to allow for the effects of inflation, as measured by annual changes in the Consumer Price Index of each year the plan is in effect.

ADJUSTING THE PRINCIPAL—A STATE SCHOLARSHIP POOL

Five percent of the total investment will be placed in a scholarship pool of the saver's state of residence for distribution to prospective students in that state according to financial need. Taxes are forgiven on the 5 percent contribution while taxes are deferred on the residual principal sum and on all earnings on principal until withdrawn.

For example:

Original investment in the plan	$2,000
Less: 5 percent contribution (tax forgiven)	100
Equals: Principal (tax deferred)	1,900

The resulting principal investment must remain in the account for at least one year.

USING THE FUNDS

Amounts withdrawn from the account for education expenses will be taxed to the beneficiary of the account over a ten-year period beginning the second year after completion of a course of studies at an approved institution of higher education or vocational school.

Education expenses include tuition, fees, books, supplies and equipment required for courses of instruction at an eligible educational institution, and a reasonable allowance for meals and lodging. An eligible institution is an approved institution of higher education or vocational school.

Each account will be administered by a custodian which is a bank, insured credit union or person satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury.

HOW THE PLAN WORKS—A HYPOTHETICAL CASE

Assume an investor with four dependents who has an annual salary of $25,000 invests in the plan. The investor's effective tax rate will be 25 percent federal and 7.5 percent state. The investor is a parent and the beneficiary is the investor's child.

The maximum of $2,000 per year is deposited over a six-year period. Deposits begin three years prior to the beneficiary's entrance into college as shown in Table 1.

This year it is expected that approximately 226,000 Marylanders will attend college; 171,000 in Maryland institutions and 55,000 in out-of-state institutions. Table 2 illustrates the effects of a 5 percent contribution to the Maryland Scholarship Pool under three participation rates in the plan.

	Student participation rates

Amount available from 5 percent contribution (million)	$1.1	$11.3	$22.6
Remaining principal	$21.5	$214.5	$429.0

Public	1,063	10,630	21,260
Private	266	2,655	5,310
Estimated tuition and fees per student in Maryland: Public—$1,063; private—$4,256

Note.—The interest earned can be reinvested in the accounts for a greater overall return. Interest earned can also be seen as additional funds for higher education expenditures by individuals as can deferred taxes to be paid by the beneficiary.

BENEFITS OF THE PLAN

1. No new federal or state agencies are required to administer this plan.

2. Referring to Table 1, each person who invests a maximum of $2,000 per year per beneficiary or student over a six-year period will have:

$3,705 in taxes deferred on deposits of $12,000.

$195 in taxes forgiven on the 5% contribution to the Scholarship Pool of $600.

$982 in taxes deferred on the interest income of $2,803.

$4,882 is the total of deferred taxes and taxes forgiven.

Since deferred taxes would be paid by the beneficiary or student, later, this $4,882 per investor could represent an additional amount of spending by the investor on higher education.

3. The plan's yield should be consistently 4 to 5 percent greater than market interest rates due to the tax deferral compounding.

4. Investors or buyers can create a possible tax-free source of funds for education which no other plan allows.

5. The fund may counter the coming reduction in government funds for operating costs and student loans.

6. Persons with investment capabilities may benefit others who cannot save.

7. Anyone can now make a charitable contribution, including persons who do not itemize their deductions. The plan is unique since the proposed contribution to the Scholarship Pool would be automatic.

CONSTRUCTING THE PLAN

The Citizens League analyzed the effects of the Higher Education Investment Plan with special emphasis on yield to the investor, funds going to the tuition pool, and taxes forgiven and deferred until payment by the beneficiary. The investor-beneficiary, where a person invests in his or her own education, is also considered.

The financial effects of the plan were calculated using assumptions and projections on participation rates and educational costs. The results are reasonable estimates of the financial effects of the plan. Table 1 summarizes selected participation by 226,000 Maryland residents who would be paying for public and independent higher education in and out of the state this year. The projected buyers are based upon Citizens League and State Board of Higher Education forecasts of enrollments.

It was assumed that 75 percent of all Maryland residents buying higher education in and out of the state will invest in the plan.

The effective yield of the plan is based upon:

1. The interest income earned on the adjusted principal, after the 5 percent scholarship pool contribution is deducted;

2. The taxes forgiven on this contribution; and

3. The value of the taxes deferred on the adjusted principal and its interest income.

It is assumed that the adjusted principal will yield an average of 10 percent, irrespective of the length of time invested. The average investor, it is further assumed, pays a 25 percent federal tax rate and 7.5 percent Maryland tax rate.

The third item, the value of the taxes deferred on the adjusted principal and its interest income is of major importance. If the investor is a parent, for example, and not a beneficiary, he or she is not obligated to pay income tax on the adjusted principal or on the accumulated income, and the deferral of taxes for this investor is treated as though the taxes are forgiven. This is the case since the beneficiary of the parent's investment will pay deferred taxes at a later date over a ten-year period upon graduation from a higher education institution. The beneficiary will pay the taxes at his or her own rate at the time of repayment. Table 3 illustrates the payback and compares this to the repayment of a student loan.

A comparison of the beneficiary's obligation to pay back taxes and earnings under the plan against a 9 percent student loan is illustrated in Table 3, below. This is especially appropriate at this time, since severe limitations will be placed on U.S. Government Student Loan Funds available to individual students in the immediate future.

Note: This table illustrates an either-or situation. Doubtless a combination of the plan and a loan would be appropriate.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ABOUT THE HIGHER EDUCATION INVESTMENT PLAN PROPOSAL

1. What will be the level of administration costs; will there be a maximum; how will they be paid?

The costs of administering the fund will be set by the administering financial institution and will vary depending on the size of the fund in that institution. Usually, the smaller the fund, the larger the percentage of the principal required to offset administrative expenses. The payment of administrative expenses should be deducted from the net return, after the 5 percent contribution to the scholarship pool. Obviously, the higher the administrative costs of an institution, the lower the net return of the plan to the investor, and the less attractive it becomes.

2. Can a rate of return on an investment in the fund be guaranteed?

This will be left up to each institution managing the fund.

3. What happens to the investment of an individual who changes residence from one state to another?

Federal benefits do not depend on the state in which the institution is located. Therefore, at the end of the calendar year, the investment could be moved from an institution in the old state to an institution in the new state, or it could be left in the original institution. The option belongs to the individual investor, and the only difference might be in the burden of state and local taxes.

4. What percentage of the investor's initial investment should be contributed to the scholarship pool?

The Citizens League believes 5 percent allows the plan to remain attractive enough to potential investors and still make a significant contribution to the students. The more contributed to the pool, the less attractive the plan will become for the investor, so that too high a percent could result in less being contributed.

5. What should be the basis for the distribution of the scholarship pool?

Funds from the pool in each state will be earmarked for scholarships according to students' academic attainment and financial need. This assumes that intellectual achievement and potential have been established by the applicant in accordance with his or her state's criteria.

6. Should the fund be allowed to make loans to individuals?

No. This provision would unnecessarily burden the fund with extra administrative expenses and also preempt other agencies and institutions from organizing to make these loans.

7. Should there be any restrictions on the types of investments made by the institutions administering the fund?

None other than those for an IRA or Keogh Plan.

8. What happens to an investor's fund if it is not used for higher education expenditures?

The 5 percent contributions to the investor's state scholarship pool would not be returned. If the investor chooses, he or she may:

a. Donate the proceeds to a state scholarship fund. The transaction would be treated as a charitable contribution; or

b. Withdraw the proceeds and pay a penalty and accumulated taxes on the deferment on principal and interest earned.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

SENATOR CHURCH AND SENATOR JORDAN

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, February 1 marks a day of honor for two of our former colleagues from the State of Idaho. That evening in Boise, friends and colleagues will gather for an evening to honor Frank Church and Len Jordan—a benefit to raise funds for the Frank Church Chair of Public Affairs and the Len B. Jordan Endowment for Economic Studies.

Over $300,000 has already been contributed to finance these two worthwhile programs, which are centered at Boise State University. It is hoped that through this event, both programs will be funded at a level of $500,000.

When fully funded, the Church Chair at Boise State will sponsor a faculty position for public affairs, as well as the Frank Church Conference on Public Affairs, held annually in Boise. The Jordan Endowment will fund scholarships and lectures that are designed to improve the understanding of economic issues by both students and the general public.

A number of distinguished public officials have already had the privilege of speaking at one of these lectures. I hope that some of our colleagues who are in the Chamber today will have an opportunity to speak at one as well.

I consider myself fortunate to have had the honor of assuming Len Jordan's seat in this body after he retired in 1972, and the privilege of serving with Frank Church during his career in the Senate. I know many of my colleagues have fond memories of their work with both of these men, who have left a lasting mark on Idaho and on the Nation.

While Senator Church and Senator Jordan are no longer with us, these two positions at Boise State University will remind future students and educators of their commitment to public service, and to addressing the issues of my State, the Nation and the world. I ask my colleagues to join me in commending the organizers of this event to benefit a worthy cause.●

"MAN OF THE YEAR" DOUG BROWN

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I rise to pay tribute to Doug Brown of Bangor, ME, who has been named "Man of the Year" by the Maine State Chamber of Commerce.

I have been privileged to know Doug both personally and professionally for many years. His is a story of hard work, determination, and an abiding concern for his home State of Maine.

I am submitting for the RECORD an article from Maine Today which details Doug's rise from modest circumstances to become the head of an extremely successful chain of food stores throughout Maine. The article also discusses his contribution to his community, which can only be described as monumental.

I am proud to call Doug Brown my friend and know that my colleagues will enjoy reading of his work and distinguished history of community involvement.

The article follows:

MAN OF THE YEAR: A DAY'S WORK PLUS 10 PERCENT

(By Diane Peterson)

"The harder I work, the luckier I get," says Douglas H. Brown, president of Doug's Shop 'n Save Stores.

From a poor farm family in Lubec to president of a chain of eight Shop 'n Save Stores with sales approaching $100 million a year, is a story of Doug Brown's self-made success. Looking back on his childhood, the hard times during the Great Depression, Brown remembers he "became very enterprising at a young age." Cutting and hauling firewood, cleaning ashes from furnaces, mowing lawns and shoveling snow from walks often brought in more money than his father was able to earn at the American Can Company. At times, the young entrepreneur put cardboard in his worn shoes for the three-mile walk to school and went to the local filling station to have his boots patched.

Brown's first introduction to the grocery business was as a delivery boy for his uncle's grocery store near his home in Lubec.

"I was intrigued by the consistency of what people ordered," he said. The amount was always the same, and the shopping habits of his uncle's customers made an impression on the delivery boy.

In 1943, when he was 14 years old, the family moved to the Portland area in search of better job opportunities, and his father was hired by the shipyard in South Portland.

When a new grocery store opened nearby in the Redbank area of South Portland, Brown remembered his observations in Lubec and believed the store would be a success.

Few people owned automobiles and Brown's family, like many others arriving to work at the wartime shipyard, had to take the bus from South Portland to downtown, shop, then carry groceries back. A Red & White grocery store, located in the neighborhood, seemed to fill a need—and provide a good opportunity.

"I said to myself, 'This ought to be a good place to work,'" Brown recalls. "People always have to eat."

So, he went in to inquire about a job. The store manager was reluctant to hire him. The manager explained that he had to see whether the new business justified more workers. Brown immediately focused on the opportunity. He made the manager an offer: he would work for nothing until he was needed. "I said to him: 'I have confidence that you're going to do more business than you think.'"

The manager accepted the offer and Brown went to work. And on pay day, Brown got a pay envelope.

He worked for the same store all through high school, and by the time he graduated in 1947, Brown had done many jobs throughout the grocery store. He also met his wife of 38 years there.

Ana Brewer worked in the meat department. She came to Portland from Houlton to be with her sister.

Although his family wanted him to go to college, Brown had other plans. He wanted to stay in the grocery business, and he wanted to get married.

When he was 18, he and his wife moved to Thomaston, where he landed a job running a store for Hannaford Bros., Inc. If he made the store a success, Hannaford told him he could buy it. At that time, Hannaford Brothers was setting firmly established in the retail part of the grocery business. The Portland-based wholesale grocery business acquired retail stores during the late 1920s. In 1939, Hannaford purchased the H.S. Melcher Company, sponsors of Red & White stores in Maine.

Brown's move to Thomaston was the first phase of his relationship with the growing wholesale and retail firm.

Although it took some unexpected turns along the way, today Doug's Shop 'n Save is the largest chain that remains in an equity partnership with Hannaford.

Although his father may not have agreed with Brown's decision not to attend college, he did offer young Douglas some advice: "No matter who you work for or what work you do—it doesn't matter how much they pay you. Give them a day's work plus 10 percent. You'll develop a reputation and you won't have to seek a job, you'll be sought after."

Brown always tried to follow his father's advice, and the results proved the wisdom in the words.

After turning the Thomaston store into a booming business in two-and-a-half years, Brown decided to exercise the option to buy it.

In this case Brown's "day's work plus 10 percent" rule apparently backfired. The purchase offer was turned down because the store now was too profitable for Hannaford to consider selling it.

So, Brown quit. He left Thomaston to work at an independent grocery store in Camden for two years, then he joined International Milling Company to sell Robin Hood flour. He stuck to his father's advice and increased that company's account. "I sized-up the competition, found out what they weren't doing and should have been doing," Brown says. 'And of course I was used to working long hours.'"

He later worked for the T.R. Savage Company of Bangor, then the largest wholesale grocery company in eastern Maine, to develop stores for the company.

In 1955, T.R. Savage merged with Hannaford, and Brown says he was "right back home." Hannaford's president told Brown, "If we didn't get anything more out of this merger other than getting you back working for us, it's worth it."

Brown became director of sales and services for the company. But he still had the itch to work for himself. In 1960, at 30 years of age, he got the chance.

The deal was an equity partnership with Hannaford for a store at Third and Union Streets in Bangor. The price of incorporation was set at $20,000. Brown borrowed his half of the money from Boutelle Savage, former president of the T.R. Savage Company.

Savage told Brown he owed him a favor for the hard work Brown did for him, "I worked 49 Saturdays and 47 Sundays in one year bringing along stores," Brown says.

Twenty-six years later, Brown chuckles when he recalls the story. Savage made only one condition to the loan: "I don't care if you ever pay the principal but never miss an interest payment."

Eventually, he acquired seven more stores—in Bucksport, Ellsworth, Brewer, Orono, Old Town and two more in Bangor. He has an equity partnership with Hannaford Brothers on seven of them and owns outright one Bangor store, the one on Broadway.

Although he didn't ever plan to own that many stores, Brown moved when he saw each opportunity. "It was just one thing after another," he says.

But, he points out, "When you put the operation together to run three stores, you must have an organization to run them successfully, so you could run 100. The same principles apply."

Brown attributes his success to a willingness to divide and grow. "I'm a builder by nature," he says. "And I've enjoyed it immensely."

A change in Hannaford's direction in the mid-60s, from equity partnerships to wholly-owned corporate stores, has imposed limits on further expansion of Brown's chain. "This has made us geographically bound," Brown says. Although he expresses frustration with the inability to expand, he says the Hannaford relationship has been good.

"In business today, you've got to keep growing—you can't stand still." But, he's quick to point out, Hannaford has allowed him the autonomy to operate.

Recent news of his retirement has been greatly exaggerated. Since he signed his first contract with Hannaford in 1960, he has had an agreement giving it first option to buy his interest in the stores when he retired or if he decided to sell. That agreement was firmed up recently, with a target date of no later than January 1989.

Brown's success in the business community parallels his contributions to the Bangor community. Bangor Daily News Vice President Arthur E. McKenzie, a longtime friend and former chairman of the Greater Bangor Chamber of Commerce, describes Brown's community work as "endless."

"He's probably the most community-minded person I know," McKenzie said. "He's so concerned about the community and is involved in everything. He doesn't turn anything down."

Last year, Brown was chairman of the board of five organizations—Eastern Maine Healthcare, Eastern Maine Medical Center, Husson College, Bangor Center Development Corporation and The Training and Development Corporation.

He is past president of the YMCA Board of Directors, past chairman of United Way Campaign, and chairman of the University of Maine Foundation. Brown also is a member of several other organizations, including the Action Committee of 50. He also has been campaign chairman for the American Heart Association, and honorary campaign chairman of the Downeast Big Brothers/Big Sisters.

Elizabeth Scott Stowell, president of the Greater Bangor Chamber of Commerce, says Brown is modest about his community work. "I don't really know how much he has done. Most is done very quietly," she said.

"There's a real sense of being kind for kindness sake and that's a really special thing about him.

"He's been involved in anything that has the least bit to do with progress in the community."

Several awards for his contributions have noted Brown's efforts, including, in 1982, the Chamber President's Award for significant contributions to the economic well-being of the community. For Brown, his involvement stems from both personal and corporate commitment.

"My father had a great belief in the more you give the more you receive—not necessarily in material things. And as poor as he was, I always thought he was wealthy."

Doug, Ana and their children, Ronald and Debra, seem to have a rule. "What we've done as a family, is try not to abuse the privileges of what we've been able to accomplish," Brown explains, "to use funds in very discreet ways to help other people."

Brown believes he owes his success to the community and he responds by merging his corporate activities into area activities. "We got involved with our dollars as well as our manpower," he says. "You have to have tremendous commitment from your subordinate management, and that I have."

Brown also credits his corporate contributions as a way to defuse any resentment about his company's dominance in the marketplace.

"We try to conduct our contributions with a spirit of community pride," he says. "As an organization, we are very cognizant of our public image. We never say 'no' to anybody."

Brown estimates the company donates about $500 a week in small grocery items to a variety of recipients—to organizations needing a turkey, or a bag of popcorn, or hot dogs for a picnic. "People respond to that," he says. "It's part of our makeup."

Some employees work for Brown through high school and college, and until recently, daughter Debra worked in the Personnel Department of the company. "We take great pride in our relationship as a family of people," he says. "We have 740 employees and we consider ourselves a family."

Employee loyalty to his company was demonstrated when a competing supermarket opened. Brown only lost one full-time and seven part-time employees to the competition.

As for the future, Brown views the takeover by Hannaford after he retires in three years as an opportunity "to wind down." For an additional two years he is to serve as a consultant.

Until 1989, Doug Brown still will give "a day's work plus 10 percent." Maybe more. Maybe longer.●

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF JOSE MARTI

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, today marks the 133d anniversary of the birth of Jose Marti.

In my home State of Florida, among my constituents in the Cuban-American community, there are many events being held in commemoration of Jose Marti. Special recognition is given to this man known to Cubans as the apostle of the Cuban revolution. Marti's words, his thoughts and his struggle for a free Cuba serve as a source of inspiration for all the world's people.

He loved freedom and pursued it with a vengeance. Liberty was so dear that he gave his life in the battle for Cuba's independence. It is appropriate that special homage is paid to this great man, for his words and his deeds have made him most prominent in the history of the Americas. It is appropriate we honor Jose Marti's love of freedom as the struggle for Cuba's independence continues today.

I can think of no greater tribute to bestow upon the legacy of Jose Marti than the radio station approved by this Congress, the radio station which bears his name. Of course, I refer to Radio Marti.

From its initial broadcasts on May 20, 1985, Radio Marti has been a steady and reliable voice. Much like Jose Marti himself, it serves as a source of inspiration for the Cuban people. As we honor this radio station's namesake, I also feel compelled to recognize the fine men and women involved in its everyday operation. Theirs is a continuous dedication accentuated by an unmatched professionalism. They enjoy the pride that comes from a job well done, from a commitment that never wanes.

To those who have criticized Radio Marti in the past, I especially would like to point out that Radio Marti's personnel strive to ensure this radio station fulfills its important responsibility of providing objective and unbiased news and information to the Cuban people. They realize that this is the only way Radio Marti can succeed. I am proud that its programs have consistently proven to be of the highest quality and exemplify a fair and objective reporting of the facts. Radio Marti's wide audience and the changes which Cuban Government-sponsored programs have had to make to continue to attract audiences lend credence to the fact that its message is being well received in Cuba.

As we commemorate Jose Marti and his struggle for freedom, we recognize the Cuban-American community's commitment to continue the cause for a free Cuba. Nowhere is this more in evidence than in the corridors and broadcast rooms of Radio Marti. Nowhere is this hope better expressed than in the faces of young and old Cubans lined up along a Jose Marti parade route waving Cuban and American flags and longing for a "Cuba libre."

Radio Marti's signal is heard loud and clear in Cuba. I am confident that by providing Cubans this uncensored voice, we will once again prove that the pen is mightier than the sword, the exchange of ideas will supersede all forms of government indoctrination. Radio Marti's truth will crush the Cuban Government's lies. The liberty Cubans feel when hearing its uncensored voice will break the bars of Castro's prisons, and uplift the spirit of a nation enslaved. Radio Marti is an appropriate tribute to the legacy of Jose Marti—the apostle of the Cuban revolution.

I have on numerous occasions spoken on the crimes and violations of international law committed by the Cuban Government. Cuba's exportation of revolution and its sponsorship of international terrorism and subversion threaten freedom in all corners of the world. This Government's insidious involvement in the exportation of drugs and in providing safe harbor to drug smugglers is well documented. I view these actions as a brazen attempt to tear at our own social fabric and the essence of our Democratic societies. Like a dagger aimed straight at our hearts, Castro encourages actions which intend to poison and incapacitate our ability to defend freedom wherever threatened.

I have come before this body and spoken on behalf of Cuba's political prisoners. I have condemned the Cuban Government's total disregard for human rights. I supported the establishment of Radio Marti as it acknowledges the Cuban people's right to the exchange of ideas, and I have favored unhindered immigration and the goals of family reunification.

Reports that the Cuban Government has been able to circumvent the embargo imposed by the United States argues for stronger means of enforcement. Shortly before the end of the 1st session of the 98th Congress, 18 Members of the Florida delegation signed a letter to President Reagan listing various recommendations which set to strengthen our policy toward Cuba. It is my hope that serious consideration will be given by the administration to these suggestions.

Mr. President, I ask that this letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, November 19, 1985.

Hon. RONALD W. REAGAN,
The President, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: For the last seven administrations, including your own, the policy of the United States toward Fidel Castro's Cuba has been one of containment and denial—containment of Castro's international adventurism and denial of the resources he needs to finance his initiatives.

The U.S. embargo of Castro has been effective, but he continues to find ways, through various loopholes in or violations of the law, of circumventing it. In addition, Castro is currently engaged in numerous subversive and terrorist activities detrimental to U.S. interests.

As you have pointed out, the Castro government promotes and sponsors international terrorism and subversion. Havana's links with terrorist groups in Latin America and the Middle East have been well documented. And Fidel Castro has recently been attempting to damage the international financial system by exhorting Latin American governments to default on their debts to the West.

In view of the above-mentioned concerns, we respectfully request that you give serious consideration to the following suggested policy options.

The United States could bring to the attention of both international organizations and Western governments the Cuban government's continuing violations of human rights, particularly the internationally recognized right "to seek, receive and impart information through any media regardless of frontiers".

As you know, Fidel Castro reneged on his promise to allow the return of about 3,000 individuals who were sent here in 1980 in violation of U.S. laws. More than five years after their arrival we strongly recommend that all Cuban/U.S. exchanges—cultural, artistic, sports, etc.—be suspended until these individuals may be returned to Cuba.

Given the role of thousands of Cuban troops in remote parts of the world, and the increasing bloodshed in Angola, the U.S. ought to seek ways of broadcasting Radio Marti to Castro's armies abroad.

In this context, the recent repeal of the Clark Amendment makes it possible for your Administration to support legislation providing assistance to the Angolan freedom fighters.

The U.S. Information Agency is successfully providing television programs via satellite all over the world. Cuban TV signals can be received in the Florida keys. Professor George H. Quester, Chairman of the University of Maryland Political Science Department, has recently written about the feasibility of TV broadcasts to Cuba "from Key West (or from a barrage balloon moored above Key West)".

The Cuban government, in its search for hard currency, exploits the Cuban-American community through several questionable schemes carried out by certain travel agencies and companies who send money and packages to Cuba. Perhaps the Justice Department could review the appropriateness of these types of activities.

Another way that Castro has been able to circumvent American laws to obtain hard currency is by encouraging the illegal use of U.S. credit cards in Cuba. To date no prosecutions have taken place based on this violation.

In view of Fidel Castro's campaign urging non-payment of the foreign debt by Third World nations, perhaps you could include U.S. concerns on this matter on every bilateral agenda with Western governments. Castro's efforts to destabilize the Western economy should not be viewed as distinct from his efforts to renegotiate his own debt. Until now the rescheduling process at the club of Paris has failed to take into consideration Castro's attempts to wreak havoc on the Western financial community.

As well as informing other governments about Castro's duplicity in the debt issue, the United States should make every effort to expose Castro's support for terrorist organizations and narco-trafficking.

The Cuban Interests Section in Washington freely distributes Cuban government publications to our opinion- and decision-makers. The United States should actively distribute through our Interests Section in Havana a wide selection of American newspapers and magazines.

From time to time it has come to our attention that some of our allies, including governments who receive American aid, purchase Cuban sugar and other exports. Given the great need among our friends in the Caribbean who produce the same commodities, you are in a position to encourage our allies to redirect their trade toward our democratic friends in the region. To this effect a systematic effort to monitor Cuban exports ought to be implemented.

In order to obtain more hard currency, Fidel Castro's government has been participating in "joint venture" companies. The establishment of such companies is an obvious effort to circumvent the U.S. trade restrictions by disguising Cuban government participation. The U.S. embargo should apply to these joint ventures in the same way as it would apply if the company were solely Cuban government-owned.

For granting the loans and trade deals to Havana, on very favorable terms, by countries that benefit from American aid, the U.S. embargo is further and directly diluted. Every effort should be made to assure that this American aid is not being transferred, directly or indirectly, to the benefit of Castro.

Mr. President, as legislators on Capitol Hill, we are prepared to help the Administration in any way we can to implement the recommendations offered herein, or any others you may feel would be useful in restraining the spread of communism from Cuba.

Very sincerely,

Claude Pepper, Bill Young, Tom Lewis, Andy Ireland, Larry Smith, E. Clay Shaw, Paula Hawkins, Connie Mack, Don Fuqua.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, the Cuban revolution of the 1800's—the revolution which took with it the life of Jose Marti—culminated with Cuba's freedom from an oppressive Spanish regime. The more recent Cuban revolution began quietly in the mountains of the Sierra Maestra and with the failed attacks on the Moncada barracks. This revolution culminated with the dictatorship of Fidel Castro and an ensuing denial of human rights.

While one revolution brought freedom to a freedom-loving people, the more recent one has brought Cubans a bleak future which promises only a constant denial of liberty.

On this 133d anniversary of the birth of Jose Marti it is appropriate that we commence a review of our Cuba policy. Are we pursuing measures which effectively rein in Cuba's antagonistic leaders? Are we striving to ensure that those who proclaim to be the enemies of our democratic principles are held accountable for the actions which severely threaten our freedom?

As we reflect on the effectiveness of our Cuba policy, it is my hope that the administration seriously considers the options recommended. Jose Marti would pursue these efforts with a vengeance.●

GEORGIA SOUTHERN EAGLES

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I rise today to take a few minutes of the Senate's time to make my colleagues aware of the amazing events surrounding a dedicated group of 105 men from Statesboro, GA, known as the Georgia Southern Eagles. This group won the 1985 National Collegiate Athletic Association Division I-AA national football championship. This is a great feat and deserves recognition in its own right. However, there are other circumstances surrounding this team which make their accomplishments almost unbelievable.

Georgia Southern College is a school with approximately 7,000 students located in Statesboro, GA. The school, which began classes in 1908, discontinued its football program in 1941 because of World War II. After a 40-year interruption, Georgia Southern decided to reinstate its football program in 1981 and hired Erskine [Erk] Russell as head football coach. The team began playing games in 1982 under club team status. In other words, the NCAA had not yet accepted Georgia Southern as a recognized member of a division. During the team's two seasons playing football as a club sport, they compiled records of 7-3-1 and 6-5.

In 1984, the Eagles began competing in NCAA Division I-AA. They finished the 1984 season at 8-3, an outstanding record considering the quality of the competition in this division. However, the accomplishments of the 1984 squad only set the stage for what the 1985 team would achieve.

Led by Tracy Ham, and All-Americans Vance Pike and Tim Foley, the Eagles compiled a regular season record of 9-2 in 1985. This record was good enough to qualify for the NCAA playoffs. The Eagles won their first two games against Jackson State and Middle Tennessee by the scores of 27-0 and 28-21, respectively. In their third playoff game, Georgia Southern and Northern Iowa were tied at 33 points apiece with 2:44 left in the game. The Eagles then marched 77 yards and won the game when quarterback Tracy Ham scored on a 20-yard run around left end with 34 seconds remaining in the game.

The Eagles next competed on December 21 in the championship game against the Furman Palladins. The Eagles fell behind 28-6 in the third quarter. However, they then scored 29 unanswered points in under 9 minutes to take the lead 35-28. Furman regained the lead, though, and with 1:34 to play, the Palladins led 42-35. The Eagles roared back down the field as Tracy Ham directed an 8-play, 88-yard drive which culminated with a 14-yard touchdown pass with 10 seconds left to play. Thus, the Eagles had won the game 44-42 and the Division I-AA national championship.

As I stated earlier, Mr. President, winning the national championship is quite an accomplishment. Winning the national championship in the second year of competition in Division I-AA is tremendous. However, winning the national championship in only the fourth year of existence is almost unparalleled in college athletics. This team also showed great character in the way they won football games exemplified by their coming from behind to win five games, including two playoff games. I want to commend President Dale Lick and the administration of Georgia Southern College, Coach Erk Russell and his assistants, and most of all, the men who compose the Georgia Southern football team for their outstanding achievement. The enthusiasm and character which the Eagles have exhibited is something for all of us to admire.●

TAX REFORM

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, for the last several years I have been working to develop a tax system that would be fair, simple, and equitable for all Americans. I proposed the Fair Tax Act to eliminate tax loopholes and lower rates for all Americans. I continue to believe that Americans want an income tax system that allows them to keep more of the money they earn and a tax law under which equal incomes pay equal taxes.

By simplifying our Tax Code and lowering tax rates, tax reform will encourage Americans to make investment decisions on economic grounds rather than to shelter their income from taxes. This, in turn, will spur economic growth, create jobs, and enhance the competitiveness of U.S. goods and services in international markets.

Mr. John H. Bryan, Jr., chairman and chief executive of Sara Lee Corp., makes an excellent argument in favor of tax reform in a current article in Fortune. Mr. Bryan focuses his article on the benefits of tax reform for the business community, and I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

WHY BUSINESS SHOULD BACK TAX REFORM

(By John H. Bryan, Jr.)

News reports from Washington suggest that corporate America was wringing its hands after President Reagan's logrolling won passage of the tax reform bill in the House of Representatives. That impression is wrong. There is strong support in the business community for tax reform, and rightly so. U.S. business would benefit greatly from the proposals put forward so far.

So why do we continue to hear that business is violently opposed to tax reform? Because the companies opposed to tax reform are the ones that own the Washington lobbying machinery that secured business tax preferences in the first place. In recent months they have been gearing up that machinery as never before. And they will continue fighting to preserve the high corporate tax rates that justify special preferences.

However, business as a whole surely would be better off with the tax system that has squeaked through the political wringer and cleared the House. The House bill is true tax reform. It substantially lowers maximum tax rates for both corporations and individuals by eliminating many tax preferences. It makes a significant step toward equitably distributing the tax burden within corporate America. And it strikes at the heart of the system that fashions tax laws by responding to the pleas of special interests.

Two issues have emerged most prominently in the tax reform debate. They are growth and fairness. First, consider growth. The centerpiece of reform is lower tax rates. We have an opportunity for the lowest U.S. tax rates in almost 50 years. No one seriously questions the notion that lower tax rates foster economic growth.

The price for lowering tax rates is the elimination of tax preferences, but that too is a change for the better. Tax preferences are obstacles to growth. They grossly misdirect human resources and misallocate the financial resources of our country. Let me back up that statement with an example.

Seven years ago Sara Lee Corp. acquired a small but growing frozen baked goods company. The company had been founded by a talented young entrepreneur who took Sara Lee stock in exchange for his company and agreed to continue running the business. Two years later he came to me with good news and bad. The good news was that during the previous year, with dividend and salary income of about $1 million, he had paid just $4,000 in federal income taxes. The bad news was that he wanted out of his contract. He had become so involved in his tax shelters that he didn't have time to run the company he founded.

I have had a total disdain for tax shelters ever since. How can it possibly be in the national interest to drive our most talented people to spend their energies and financial resources on schemes to avoid taxes?

Tax preferences for corporations will cost the federal government approximately $120 billion this fiscal year, well over half the budget deficit. This tax relief comes from the investment tax credit, accelerated cost recovery, and dozens of lesser-known loopholes sprinkled throughout the tax code. These preferences create a de facto industrial policy, one which grants government subsidies on an uneven basis throughout the business community. This industrial policy is hidden in a complicated tax code, and thus has not been publicly debated.

The test of this policy should be whether these tax-generated grants are producing a worthwhile and intended effect. The presumed purpose of most tax incentives is to stimulate growth and create jobs. But if this is true, why do we allocate most tax breaks to nongrowing, low-labor-intensive industries? My board of directors would fire me in an instant if I allocated our corporate capital to our low-growth businesses and starved the fast-growing ones.

Tax preferences do create discretionary cash for corporations, which they presumably use to build new factories and create new jobs. However, several trends are worth noting. It is interesting that corporate acquisitions have grown massively, and some companies that pay little or no taxes have been among the acquirers.

General Electric is sensitive about accusations that it will pay for RCA with money it got from tax preferences. But GE cannot deny that its coffers were greatly enhanced by tax policy in recent years. This fuels the debate about whether the RCA acquisition is a growth-oriented, job-creating investment or simply a diversification move, perhaps even a strategy to exploit unused tax credits.

Corporations also have been buying in significant amounts of their own shares. Merrill Lynch estimates that announced repurchases of common stock amounted to $42 billion in the first nine months of last year. Companies that received tax breaks have been some of the largest repurchasers. Tax preferences received by Sara Lee have had noninfluence on our capital investment decisions, but they have provided funds for both acquisitions and stock repurchasers.

The tax reform debate also centers on the issue of fairness. Anti-reform business lobbyists argue that it is unfair to raise business taxes while lowering personal taxes. They fail to note that the increasing use of preferences has lowered corporate tax payments dramatically in recent years. In 1960 corporations paid 23% of all federal taxes. By 1983 the corporate share was down to 6%. The statutory corporate tax rate is 46%, but corporations pay an average of about 17% of their pretax profits to the federal government. I am confident that skilled managers will eventually wipe out all tax revenues from business if the tax code is not reformed.

Defenders of the current corporate tax system ignore its greatest unfairness; the absurd range of effective tax rates that apply to different industries. The chemical industry's average tax rate is minus 1%, while pharmaceutical companies pay an average of 27% of their profits in taxes. Fairness makes reform of such disparate rates imperative.

Some opponents of tax reform make the assertion that the only fair system would be no corporate taxes. They argue that corporations don't pay taxes, but merely pass them along to their customers. In fact, there is no way to determine exactly how a company absorbs any cost. But even if you accept the premise that corporations simply pass income taxes along, we cannot abolish the corporate income tax. To do so could create the greatest tax shelter ever: everyone would rush to incorporate, just as many doctors, lawyers, and entertainers do now. For that reason, there must be close parity between corporate and individual tax rates.

When the Senate takes up tax reform this year, some businessmen will be arguing in favor of it and some against. The split is simply and obviously a matter of self-interest. It is easier for me to espouse my personal convictions about tax reform because the legislation will have a positive effect on Sara Lee. My corporate friends with low effective tax rates oppose reform because it will have the opposite effect on their companies.

Many business leaders say to me in private, "You're right in principle, but you're naive. If I don't fight for my tax breaks, Congress will just give them to someone else." Or, "If we eliminate business tax breaks, they won't really lower the rates. They'll just raise everybody's taxes and spend more money." And, finally, they close their arguments with the clincher: "That tax bill will cost my company X millions every year."

While not very persuasive, these sentiments are understandable. Chief executives are paid to serve the interests of their companies. But our elected representatives must not make judgments based on the self-serving songs of business. They must judge the issue on a higher plane. President Reagan and the House have agreed to the basic principle that we can promote growth more efficiently, and raise revenues more equitably, by lowering rates and reducing tax preferences. The Senate must surely agree.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In accordance with the previous order, the Senate will stand in recess until the hour of 2 p.m.

Thereupon, at 11:59 a.m., the Senate recessed until 2 p.m.

The Senate reassembled at 2 p.m., when called to order by the Vice President.

THE SPACE SHUTTLE "CHALLENGER" TRAGEDY

(Note: At approximately 11:39 a.m., shortly after being launched at Cape Canaveral, FL, the space shuttle Challenger exploded. On board were Francis R. Scobee, mission commander; Michael J. Smith, pilot; Dr. Judith A. Resnick, electrical engineer; Dr. Ronald E. McNair, physicist; Lt. Col. Ellison S. Onizuka of the Air Force, Gregory B. Jarvis, engineer with the Hughes Aircraft Co., and Christa McAuliffe, a New Hampshire school teacher.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chaplain will lead us in prayer.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Eternal God, our hearts are smitten and we are reduced to silence. Let us pray silently for a few moments and then I will attempt to verbalize a prayer for all of us.

(Moment of silence.)

"Father in Heaven, this must be what the Apostle Paul meant when he wrote "the Spirit helps us in our weakness for we do not know how to pray as we would like. But the Spirit itself interferes for us with sighs too deep for words."—Romans 8:26.

God of love, comfort the husband and children of Christa McAuliffe in this devastating reversal of the excitement they felt in anticipation of such an important event in their lives. Give consolidation to the spouses and families of the astronauts in their tragic loss. Be with those responsible for ground control, lift-off, and all space officials in their quiet agony as they ask hard questions and rehearse over and over in their minds every detail of the operation.

Be with the President, the Vice President, the Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and all leadership in this inexpressible tragedy. Bless Senator GLENN, Senator GARN, and Representative NELSON as they struggle with their thoughts. Help the press and the media in their responsibility to communicate to the Nation this traumatizing event. And, dear God, touch our whole Nation redemptively in grace. In the name of incarnate love. Amen.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senate shares the Nation's grief with the tragedy at Cape Canaveral today. We have apparently lost seven brave Americans who dedicated their lives to probing the unknown. Our prayers and sympathies go out to the families of these American heroes.

We are shocked by the wrenching image of this Nation's scientific pride and joy disappearing over the Florida Coast. Many in this body have come to know our astronauts and they are indeed the right stuff: Vibrant, fearless individuals who have proudly carried the red, white, and blue into outer space. We are immensely proud of our own shuttle crew member, Senator JAKE GARN of Utah, and space pioneer Senator JOHN GLENN of Ohio. And so today's disaster is a personal, as well as a national, loss.

The space shuttle has been a symbol of America's commitment to excellence and achievement. Its superb track record has made these launches almost routine, but we are now reminded that the road to the heavens is a dangerous one.

Let us remember the five men and two women who have, we fear, given their lives to their country.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished majority leader.

All Americans have been stunned and saddened by this tragedy. The seven courageous heroes who lost their lives in the Challenger today were a cross section of our Nation's finest men and women—in mind, spirit, discipline, commitment, talent, and training. They will stand out in our history as pristine examples of the continuing willingness and ability of Americans to attempt and to accomplish the hazardous for the sake of national and human progress. In this time of loss, we hold the families, friends, and colleagues of those who have died in our hearts and in our prayers.

Mr. GLENN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, there has been a quarter century of the space program that we have been very proud of. Today's tragedy involves man's attempt to try, and to go ahead, and man triumphs. It requires dedication to do that. Occasionally, our judgments, the things we do, are not perfect. Sometimes triumph is accompanied by tragedy. We hoped to push this day back forever, but that was not to be. So the tragedy is not only for our space program, but for all Americans who share a sense of loss.

As one who has been personally involved in the program, I feel a particularly personal sense of loss because there have been 55 successful manned missions. I believe this was the 56th one today. This was the 25th shuttle flight over a 5-year period.

Our triumphs have been many along with the tragedy of today. This is the first time we have lost anyone actually in flight in space.

I guess about all I can say is that in the days and weeks ahead, I, my family, and I am sure all of you stand united in the hope that the Good Lord will grant a measure of comfort and understanding to the families and the friends of the seven courageous people up there today. They indeed carried our hopes and our dreams with them. Let us carry their memory with us.

Mr. GARN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). The Senator from Utah.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I will not attempt to say what I feel because it is difficult for me to do so. It is not only a tragedy that John has spoken about.

First, let me thank all of you for paying tribute to my friends. It is especially hard because I trained with most of them. Mike Smith, the pilot, was known as my mother hen, the first one with whom I was in training in Houston. Mike was assigned to me to show me the ropes. He was a magnificent young man, and a tremendous naval aviator.

Each one of them were very dedicated to their country. I am simply incapable of going on, but I want to just say thank you to my colleagues for taking this time to pay tribute to my friends.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate that we are waiting for a resolution from the House resetting the date of the State of the Union Message to be a week from today. I assume it will be at the same time.

Mr. President, the only business to be transacted today is I will file a cloture motion. We will wait for the joint resolution. Then we will recess in respect to the shuttle crew. There will be no votes today.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader offer the resolution immediately so we can then go out following his offering of the cloture motion?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of all Members be added to the resolution which the distinguished majority leader will be offering.

CONRAIL SALE AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send a cloture motion to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on amendment No. 1437 to S. 638, a bill to amend the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 to provide for the transfer of ownership of the Consolidated Rail Corporation to the private sector, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I request, on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM], the yeas and nays on the motion of the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. DANFORTH] when that motion comes before the Senate tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. Yes, I yield.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, in light of the fact that a vote was expected today and some of us planned to be here today to make that vote, is there any thought as to when that vote might come tomorrow so we can plan to be here?

Mr. DOLE. We shall come in probably at 10 a.m., I assume, tomorrow. That vote, I suspect, should come somewhere around, between 12 and 1 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I can try to be here. I thank the majority leader.

THE SPACE SHUTTLE "CHALLENGER"

Mr. HART. Will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. Yes, I yield.

Mr. HART. I was unclear from the remarks he made. Is it the intention of the majority leader to offer a resolution of regret on behalf of the Senate?

Mr. DOLE. Yes, it is. I ask unanimous consent that all Members be made cosponsors of that resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I am sure that several Senators might have comments to make on the question of the tragedy. Does the leader want us to proceed now or does he want to set aside some time when those comments may be made?

Mr. DOLE. What I would like to do now is recess. I think we can do that by unanimous consent. We can perhaps set aside some time when Members may include their statements in the RECORD at this point as if given, or they may wish to proceed at this point. I am not trying to shut off anyone.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all Senators may extend their remarks in the RECORD today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the untimely accident of the space shuttle Challenger and its crew is unquestionably the most tragic episode in the history of our Nation's Space Program. While at this time the details of the accident have not been confirmed, it appears that the lives of the seven crew members—Comdr. Dick Scobee, Michael Smith, Judith Resnik, Ron McNair, Ellison Onisuka, Gregory Jarvis, and Christa McAuliffe—are in question. We as a nation pray for them and their loved ones and recognize and commend the valiant service that they have committed to our Nation.

Not since the January 27, 1967, accident of the Apollo 204 spacecraft, in which our three astronauts died on the launch pad as a result of a fire in the spacecraft, has our Space Program faced such a disastrous moment and uncertain future. Just as with the 1967 accident, Congress will throughly investigate this present accident and its potential impact on the future of our Nation's involvement in space. We owe this to the astronauts involved and to our Nation.

Meanwhile, we anxiously await further information on the accident. This tragedy will be indelibly imprinted on our minds as individuals and on our Nation's consciousness. Again, our deepest thoughts and prayers are with the seven crew members and their families.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, this is a day of tragedy for our seven fellow Americans who have been lost in space, for their families and friends, for all who have shared in the great American and human exploration of space, and for all Americans. On this day, we are tied by history and memory with these seven of our fellow citizens and with all humans who, over the centuries have risked their lives and their safety to increase the knowledge of all humans about the world in which we live, about the space which surrounds us, and about our own place in creation. These seven Americans are now an immortal part of that history. We remember through them the courage of all who have preceded them in space, including two highly distinguished Members of this body.

We are reminded once again that the price we as humans pay for an increase of knowledge about the world in which we live is paid not in dollars alone, but also in the lives of those who have the daring to attempt to push back the frontiers of knowledge as far as they can.

We know, because it is our duty here in the Senate, that we must now examine closely, soberly, and objectively the physical causes of this disaster. We know that we must take every action that is within our power to see to it that it is not repeated.

We are reminded, of course, as we engage in the 56th American manned exploration of space, the 25th launching of a space shuttle, that it is still an experiment at this point and that it is accompanied by great danger. We also know, as tragic as this incident has been, that it will not end our inquiry, our quest for knowledge, or the supply of the brave and dedicated Americans who are willing and anxious to be on the cutting edge of this exploration.

So we especially honor these seven, who will be remembered for a long, long time for their courage and dedication. We pray for them and for their souls. We pray and we hope for comfort to those who have survived them here, those who have worked so hard on this mission which went awry in spite of their best and most dedicated efforts.

We in this body dedicate ourselves to the improvement, and the increasing safety of, our Nation's Space Program. We appreciate the past service of many men and women, while we remember and grieve for those who have passed from us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Chair. I want to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from Washington, who serves as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Science and Space, as I serve as the ranking member of that subcommittee, and join with him in the expression of sorrow that is felt by all Americans. I think every American citizen is heartsick at what has occurred today. Watching it replayed on television and seeing the family members of the astronauts whose lives were lost today is an experience that will change all of us, change us all in ways that time will not affect.

Today's space disaster is one, as Senator GLENN has said, which comes after really a remarkable degree of success and safety of our Space Program now over many long years. I was struck by his comment that prior to today no astronauts have been lost on any space mission. We had one other tragedy on the ground where three atronauts, including Chafee from Michigan, lost their lives some years ago. But this is the first time this has happened on a space flight, which I think by itself is a remarkable statement about what we have been able to achieve over this long period of years up until today. So we owe these astronauts who gave their lives today answers as to what went wrong, and I think we likewise owe to every other astronaut that we will not ask them to undertake any further flight until we have the answers, until the appropriate officials within NASA and those who otherwise have responsibility for oversight here have determined as best we can exactly what went wrong and to fix whatever problems may have caused this disaster so that we do not put others in the future at the risk of this kind of accident.

The President's decision to postpone the State of the Union Message today and for the House and Senate to shortly conclude their business for today is the appropriate step for us to take as a nation.

I conclude by saying to the memory of those astronauts who were lost today and to their families who carry this terrible pain and suffering today, there is a great love in this country for them at this moment of profound personal loss. We are heartsick about this tragedy today and will do everything we can within our power to prevent it from happening again.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, although this tragedy occurred over the State of Florida, California and many Californians have played a vitally significant role in creating the air shuttle and in space exploration generally. I speak on behalf of all Californians in expressing our deep sorrow for this tragedy, our regret of the loss of lives of those who perished and our deep sympathy for the members of their families and friends who survive. I know that California, the United States, and the world will want to carry on the exploration of space, and I am confident that we will do so. We will want to know, to the best of our ability, what happened to cause this tragic event. We will hope to learn whatever lessons there are to be drawn from that, but I think we also recognize that all forms of travel, like most human experiences, are fraught with danger. I know that we will seek to overcome the dangers, that we will do our utmost to do so, and we will soon once again be carrying on our ventures into space.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, no words, not even the eloquent tributes paid by my distinguished colleague, can adequately express either the grief of the American people or our sympathy for the families and loved ones of the crew of Challenger. The only way we can adequately honor the memory and sacrifice of these magnificent seven young Americans is for the United States to attempt in small part to match their courage. We have been reminded by their tragedy that all of those who venture into space to benefit mankind place their lives at risk. The only way we can vindicate their faith is to keep faith with them. It is for America to continue with our space program and not to falter. Those whom we have lost today would be the first to say to us, "persevere, go forward," because these were pioneers in the truest sense of that word and in the greatest American tradition of pioneering. They were people willing to take risks, even to risk their lives in order to benefit mankind. For us to adequately honor them, Mr. President, is for America to keep their rendezvous in destiny and in space. We dare not falter lest we be false to their memory.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, like all Americans, we feel a sense of personal loss over the tragedy which occurred today shortly after the Challenger lifted off from the Kennedy Space Center. When we embarked a quarter century ago on the great voyage into space President Kennedy said, "It will not be one man going to the Moon; it will be an entire Nation."

Seven brave astronauts pursuing that dream were apparently killed today and our entire Nation has been wounded. From their sacrifice let us resolve once more to continue the work to which they gave their skill and their courage and their lives.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, today our thoughts and our prayers are with those who have died in this terrible tragedy, and with their loved ones.

It is impossible to put into words the anguish we feel as a nation at the loss of seven Americans, who had dedicated themselves and their lives to improving our world through scientific exploration and achievement.

They knew that their life's work, as routine as these shuttle flights have become to most of us, involved a great deal of personal risk. They chose to accept that risk in order to acquire the kind of scientific knowledge that will benefit all of mankind. These seven courageous individuals currently have our grief. They deserve our commemoration.

Mr. President, again, our hearts and our prayers go to those who have suffered enormous personal loss today. May God be with them, and all Americans, during this national tragedy.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, America is shocked and saddened by today's tragic accident which is so unexpected after the brilliant success of the Shuttle Program. Our hearts reach out to the families and friends of the seven men and women who traveled on this mission. It is a tragic reminder that the Space Program, like other human adventures, is not without its costs.

From the beginnings of recorded history, human beings have longed to enlarge their knowledge of the universe. But exploration and discovery have always exacted a heavy human price. Men and women have been called upon to sacrifice their lives as we have extended the boundaries of our knowledge and wisdom. We recall the costly search for the Northwest Passage and the disappearance of Amelia Earhart as two of the many examples of pioneers and explorers who never came home. Sadly, exploration cannot succeed without these sacrifices, and as we enjoy the benefits made possible by that exploration, we must never forget those who gave their lives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, the people of the Nation feel a deep grief today. The people of New Hampshire feel a very special and profound sense of loss because the first teacher in space, Christa McAuliffe—a woman of indomitable spirit, a mother of two young children, who wished to do this to further education in America—was apparently lost today off Cape Canaveral. We will always remember Christa McAuliffe for her special spirit and the enthusiasm that she brought to life. The people of New Hampshire will especially remember her as one who cared about her students, the development of their minds, and the furtherance of their opportunities. She will go down in the history of our State and our Nation as a woman who dared to try. We will remember her and we will pray for her and her family for a long time to come.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am stunned by the tragedy of today's space shuttle explosion and the apparent loss of the crew members. I share the sorrow of their families and my deepest sympathies and prayers are with them.

I sense this is a national tragedy, a trauma that will live in our minds and hearts much in the way the shooting of a President does. I know it is a mark in our history that will always be vivid in my mind.

From the very beginning of our space exploration, the involvement of human lives has dictated utmost care and caution at each step, and this has been borne out by the number of times flights have been delayed. No chances have been taken.

But this catastrophe reinforces that we can take nothing for granted; we cannot relax our diligence. We as a people and as a nation have benefited greatly from space exploration, but we must have answers; we must understand exactly what has happened before any further launches can be made. Exhaustive investigations and inquiries lie ahead.

SPACE SHUTTLE "CHALLENGER" TRAGEDY

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, words are inadequate for expressing the shock and grief which swept across our Nation Tuesday as we learned of the tragic takeoff of the space shuttle Challenger.

Still fresh in our minds are images of these brave Americans smiling and laughing, clearly anxious to begin their shuttle journey.

We are all overwhelmed with sorrow for the families of these astronauts, one of whom was a New Hampshire schoolteacher. It is difficult to imagine the heartbreak they are experiencing.

I do not doubt that workers at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration are among those most grieved, having lost some of their best and brightest in this tragedy. These astronauts spent years preparing for this mission.

During nearly 12 years as a member of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, I have developed a deep appreciation for NASA and its dedicated and conscientious workers. The agency has a glory-filled history that has been a source of pride to all Americans.

NASA has carried out 55 successful man-in-space missions, including those in which man first walked on the Moon. In the past 5 years, there have been 24 successful shuttle missions.

No one has forgotten the 1967 tragedy during which three Apollo astronauts were killed in a launch pad explosion. Now, 19 years later, we have witnessed the first in-the-air disaster in our Nation's space history.

Once our disbelief and shock have passed, many tough questions must be asked.

We demand and await answers as to why these seven young lives were lost. Before any other missions are undertaken, we must know why this one went so terribly wrong.

More often than not, through the years, NASA has been criticized for being overly cautious rather than lax. The agency's safety record is a tribute to its workers, who combine their diverse backgrounds to make space exploration possible.

It was an appreciation of the space program that led Christa McAuliffe to yearn to be the first teacher, and the first citizen, in space. She was a credit to her profession simply because of her great desire to experience space so that she could inspire and challenge our Nation's youth. The program has been remarkable and has contributed many benefits to our society through the years. This brave young woman wanted to illustrate that through televised lessons from space.

As classrooms across the United States and Canada watched the ill-fated liftoff, I am sure many teachers felt unable to explain what was seen on television. I hope most of them were able to convey to their students that the tragedy illustrates why America is great; that we have brave men and women who are willing to face danger, and to sacrifice, so that the Nation's dreams can come true.

Certainly, it is time to reexamine the entire space program and where it is going. However, we cannot fail to adequately assess the space program's success and achievements.

We in Congress must assure the Nation that explanations for this tragedy will be demanded. Meanwhile, our sympathies and prayers go out to those who lost loved ones in this space shuttle launch.

CHALLENGER TRAGEDY: TIME FOR REFLECTION

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the explosion that claimed the lives of all seven aboard the space shuttle Challenger is a dreadful tragedy that has shocked and saddened the Nation.

It also is a lesson to all of us that we should never take for granted the calm courage and the quiet heroism that makes even the exploration of outer space look routine.

Any loss of life is tragic, but the death of Christa McAuliffe, a schoolteacher selected to ride on the space shuttle, highlights the tragedy because she represented the hopes of so many to join the veteran space pioneers of NASA.

I am truly saddened by this tragedy, and I grieve for the brave men and women who were lost and for their families.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, just as there are times in our national life when we celebrate together, so there are times when we mourn together. This is such a time—a time for all of us to reaffirm the values that make us one people.

The astronauts who were lost today were the embodiment of the strength and the best of our country. They stand in the place of all the brave men and women who defend us, who push back the frontiers of science—and tragically today, of all those who teach our children.

President Kennedy said 25 years ago of the space program: "We take a risk by making the commitment in full view of the world."

Today the world saw what that risk can mean.

The world saw what manner of men and women we have among us who give of themselves—and today their lives—to our country.

Tomorrow, for many tomorrows to come, when other Americans sail on the sea of space, they will honor the memory of these magnificent seven who made the ultimate sacrifice: Comdr. Francis Scobee, Copilot Michael Smith, Judith Resnik, Ellison Onizuka, Arnold McNair, Satellite Engineer Gregory Jarvis, and Christa McAuliffe.

Our hearts go out to their families. They have an imperishable place in history.

Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, the tragic loss today of the space shuttle Challenger and, apparently, her crew is indeed shocking to us all. It is with profound sadness, yet, respect, that we remember the courage and heroism of these brave Americans. I personally am distressed and deeply saddened over this tragedy. Our thoughts and prayers go out to the families and friends of the crewmembers.

In the days to come, I am confident NASA will conduct an intensive investigation to determine the cause of this accident. Our Space Program is vital to the defense of our national security and must move ahead despite the unfortunate events of this morning.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, to merely comment that we are all deeply saddened and shocked by the tragic explosion of the shuttle Challenger this morning seems inadequate. For Americans who have enjoyed so many triumphs of the Space Program from their living rooms, to now face this tragedy leaves us with the sense of inescapable loss. And yet no such feeling compares with the loss suffered by the families and friends of the seven-member crew.

Awed by the first steps on the Moon, we are no less impressed by the ventures which have been made by NASA over the past decades bringing the heavens closer to our realm. Yet, on this fateful day we pause and wonder. We pause and ask if our sights are too high, the costs too great.

As we all know, Christa McAuliffe, the first teacher chosen for space travel, was aboard the Challenger. It was appropriate that a member of the teaching profession, dedicated to preparing our young for the challenges of the future, was chosen for what was to be a historic venture. It was appropriate that a teacher was involved in our space program which continues to provide the stimulus for research and technology development which has enriched our lives for decades.

History may view the tragic events of today as a setback. And yet, there may be no greater reaffirmation of the crew's commitment to the venture's goals than the successful continuance of the Space Program.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, words fail to describe my emotions as we discuss the loss of the entire space shuttle Challenger crew. There is no easy way to relay the feelings we all felt upon hearing the news of the explosion of the shuttle. In the pit of our stomachs something clenches and will not unclench.

Perhaps we had forgotten that the paths to the heavens are treacherous. Man's fallibility and our inability to completely control our surroundings has been proven yet again. I had begun to take space travel for granted, perhaps many of us have. In the early days of our Space Program, we had a healthy fear of space and space travel. Recently, we had begun to think of it as safe. Clearly, we need to rethink that notion.

One of the things that has distinguished America as a nation has been our willingness to hide nothing—neither our victories nor defeats. In this hour of defeat, we must commit ourselves to finding answers to what has happened today. In that regard, I would urge the President to delay all further shuttle missions until we completely understand what caused this tragedy. At the same time, we must move ahead cautiously and not abandon our commitment to exploration of the vastness that surrounds us.

My deepest sorrow today is for the families of those who died in today's explosion. We grieve as a nation and as individuals knowing, but not fully comprehending, the pain that the families and friends of the members of the Challenger crew are experiencing. To them, I extend my heartfelt sympathy and my prayers.

It is appropriate that the Senate recessed early today, and it is appropriate that the President has canceled today's State of the Union Address so we can grieve as a nation and as members of the family of man.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, we are stunned and deeply saddened by today's event at Cape Canaveral.

The loss of the seven men and women aboard the shuttle is a tragedy which touches all Americans. They were individuals of vigor, accomplishment, and hope, who represented the best of America.

Mr. President, those who have sought to advance the frontiers of our knowledge, to expand our understanding of science and our environment, have always undertaken extraordinary risks. The Challenger team followed in that tradition of courageous individuals dedicated to a better world and a brighter future.

Mr. President, as the Nation honors these brave men and women, our thoughts and prayers are with their families and their communities to whom they gave so much.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, today all of us are extremely moved by the tragedy at Cape Canaveral. The Shuttle Program has been fate free for 24 flights. But today, on perhaps the most highly publicized flight, seven of America's finest have lost their lives.

What was projected to be a coup for the educational community, our children, and teachers nationwide, has resulted in the fate of a teacher from Concord, NH, Sharon Christa McAuliffe. Christa was selected from among over 11,000 applicants to represent teachers nationwide. She had been studying since September 1985, to develop the lesson plans for two classes that she was to have taught from space. Thousands of schoolchildren nationwide eagerly anticipated this new dimension in their learning.

When Christa was selected last year, educational associations nationwide banded together with pride to encourage teachers and children alike to keep their porch lights on from 7 p.m. on Thursday evening until 7 a.m. on Friday morning—the morning that Christa was scheduled to teach her first lesson. In memory of the entire crew, Americans are being encouraged to keep those lights on. A tragic turn of events.

Christa represented our Nation's teachers extremely well. She exuded confidence and a tremendous love for learning. Her training, which included instruction in weightlessness and confinement in a black bag to simulate conditions in space, was a constant adventure. And she was not willing to put herself in the limelight. Rather, she gave constant credit to her fellow educators and astronauts.

I ask Americans nationwide to pray for the immediate families of the seven shuttle members. America is stunned by this event, and I hope and pray that we would band together in support of one another.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, like all Americans and all people around the globe who recognize the value of human life, I was filled with complete and total shock when I first learned of the horrible tragedy which struck the space shuttle Challenger and its seven-member crew. The memory of this disaster will remain with us always, as will the dreadful, sinking, emotional feeling I am sure we all experienced as we learned of the explosion.

We have not yet learned all the details of the tragedy. We still do not know what caused the explosion or what could have been done to prevent it. We can be certain, however, that the incident will be probed and investigated until we have learned all that can be learned. I have always been a fervent supporter of our Space Program, but, in our quest for further learning about the Moon, the planets, and the stars, we cannot lose sight of the necessity of taking every possible safety precaution.

Just a little more than 19 years ago, on January 27, 1967, three Apollo astronauts were killed during a test of their spacecraft. In the wake of that tragedy, which was the only previous loss of life during training or performance of a NASA flight, we basically placed the Space Program on hold while instituting greater safeguards. Today, it is just as necessary that we gain even greater strength from this tragic occurrence, and I am fully confident that NASA will become even more determined than ever to fulfill the greatest possible role in exploring our last frontier in the absolutely safest environment possible.

The Space Shuttle Program has been one of the greatest technological achievements in the history of mankind, and all Americans have been proud of the growth of the program. We must not look at this tragedy as a betrayal of the Shuttle Program, but as a turning point for even greater efforts.

In spite of this calamity, NASA has had a remarkable record of safety and efficiency. One cannot witness a launch without realizing the danger from the fire, the thrust, and the power. Nevertheless, this horrible explosion should renew and strengthen our efforts to protect human life as we continue to explore the unknowns of space.

The seven patrotic Americans who lost their lives during this tragic accident—Francis (Dick) Scobee, Michael Smith, Ronald McNair, Judith Resnik, Ellison Onizuka, Gregory Jarvis, and Christa McAuliffe—will always live in our memories. Their efforts on behalf of our Space Program must not go unnoticed or unrewarded; it would be a fitting legacy, one of which I am sure they would be proud, for us to learn from and grow because of their loss, for then they will surely not have died in vain. To their loved ones, their friends, their coworkers, go our thoughts and our prayers.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, today is a sad day in the U.S. Space Program. The tragic explosion of the shuttle orbiter Challenger this morning has shocked the Nation and has dealt a severe blow to the Nation's Space Program.

I should like to express my heartfelt sympathy to the families of the shuttle crew of mission 51-L. Dick Scobee, Michael Smith, Judith Resnik, Ronald McNair, Ellison Onizuka, Gregory Jarvis, and Christa McAuliffe will not be forgotten, nor will their dreams and aspirations. Man will continue to voyage into space and to respond to the challenges of new frontiers. Unfortunately, seven of America's finest have been lost to space and our space effort.

Mr. President, at this point in time, it is hard to consider anything but the fate of the crew and their families' loss. However, it is absolutely critical that the cause of this accident be determined as soon as possible. I would recommend, therefore, that the Shuttle Program be halted until this accident can be thoroughly investigated by NASA and the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation. The shuttle is a critical component of our civilian and military space programs. However, the safety of the crew is an even more critical component of our Space Program. I hope that a thorough review of this tragedy will result in safer space flight for those who follow Dick Scobee, Michael Smith, Judith Resnik, Ronald McNair, Ellison Onizuka, Gregory Jarvis, and Christa McAuliffe into space.

Mr. President, in 1967, when Virgil Grissom, Edward White, and Roger Chaffee were killed in the only other U.S. manned space flight tragedy, the Space Program was put on hold for 18 months until the cause of the tragedy could be thoroughly investigated by NASA and the Senate Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences. The result of those investigations and hearings was a "safer" Space Program and a successful Apollo Program.

Today, the same challenge confronts NASA and the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, and it is my hope that the Senate Commerce Committee will turn our attention to this investigation immediately.

The purpose of a Senate Commerce Committee investigation would be fourfold:

First, to establish the facts related to the accident.

Second, to insure that the formal NASA inquiry is conducted with complete objectivity.

Third, to establish the validity of any recommendations to prevent recurrence.

Fourth, to review such other aspects of NASA's stewardship of the Shuttle Program which may be necessary to accomplish the foregone objectives.

Mr. President, I stand prepared to initiate this investigation immediately, to work with NASA to find the cause of this tragedy, and to make the necessary improvements to the shuttle to prevent a future recurrence.

Today is a sad day in the Nation's history, and I hope that all Americans will take time to bow their heads and pray for Dick Scobee, Michael Smith, Judith Resnik, Ronald McNair, Ellison Onizuka, Gregory Jarvis, and Christa McAuliffe. Their dreams were our dreams, and their loss is our loss.

I speak from personal experience when I describe the Nation's loss today, because Ron McNair, a native son of South Carolina and a man who had dedicated his life to the people of South Carolina and the Nation's Space Program, was one of the seven astronauts lost in today's tragedy.

If ever an astronaut was truly made of the right stuff, it was Ron. And I would like to express my heartfelt sympathy to his mother, Pearl, who lives in Lake City, SC, and his wife, Cheryl, and his two children, who live in Houston.

I had the pleasure of knowing Ron, and I can tell you that seldom has one person done so much for his home State. Whereas most people spend their free time pursuing personal pleasures, Ron spent his free time going throughout the State of South Carolina telling kids about the importance of getting a good education and staying in school. When students at Spartanburg High School wanted a speaker last February to speak during Black History Month, Ron was nice enough to take the podium on my behalf.

Ron McNair was special, and you knew that the moment you met him. Educated at Carver High School in Lake City, SC, Ron went on to get a B.S. at North Carolina A&T, a Ph.D. in physics at MIT, and several honorary doctorates, including one from the University of South Carolina.

The Nation's Space Program suffered a great loss today; the Nation suffered a great loss today; South Carolina suffered a great loss today.

My heartfelt sympathy goes out to the family of Ron McNair, and I guarantee that I will continue to work to fulfill his dreams.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, today our Nation grieves over the enormous loss which we suffered today off the coast of Cape Canaveral, FL.

The citizens of the State of New Hampshire are especially touched by our national loss. The first teacher of space was to have been a brave woman from Concord, NH, Christa McAuliffe. Christa carried forth with her onto her journey the same enthusiasm and dedication which she brought to the students of her classroom every day. Her courage will serve as an inspiration to students in New Hampshire and across our Nation. Christa will be remembered as one of our State's great citizens.

I join in offering my profound sympathy to Christa's family, including her husband Steve and her two children, as well as the families of the other crew members. All of them have bravely given their lives in service of our country.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I rise to join my colleagues and, indeed, the entire Nation, in extending my prayers for the astronauts who lost their lives today in the explosion of the space shuttle Challenger and in offering my sympathies and condolences to their families.

Safety has always been of paramount importance during the hugely successful U.S. Space Exploration Program. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration [NASA] has always emphasized this critically important aspect of manned space flight and it is this practically unblemished record that makes today's tragedy all the more difficult to comprehend.

But, Mr. President, the loss of Challenger reminds us in a cruel way of the dangers that have always existed in the efforts made to push back frontiers and to explore the unknown. It is ironic, Mr. President, that this tragedy occurs during a week when another space exploration vehicle, the Voyager 2 spacecraft has provided us with a wealth of new information about our universe during its travel through the solar system.

Thus, Mr. President, we have extraordinary success with Voyager at the same time that we encounter the acutely painful loss of the Challenger crew. I am confident, though, that the courageous crew of Challenger would be the first to urge that we continue the efforts that they were making to explore space, to expand our knowledge, and to apply those lessons for the benefit of all those on our Earth.

However, that does not make their loss any easier to accept and I pray for those affected by the tragedy. Perhaps the pain of their loss can be eased by knowing that our Nation shares their sorrow.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, words do not adequately express the personal shock and sadness I feel for the brave crew of the shuttle Challenger and for the grieving families of these American heros. The pain is very close to home with the knowledge that the captain of the shuttle Challenger, Francis R. (Dick) Scobee, is from the State of Washington. My deepest sympathy goes to Captain Scobee's family and the families of the entire Challenger crew.

In May of 1984, I had the pleasure of visiting with the crew of the 11th space shuttle mission, at which time I met Dick. He will be remembered as a hero and a pioneer on the frontier of space.

It is premature to speculate about the cause of this tragedy. However, we must remember that in our Space Program we are working on the edge of technology. Perhaps we have become overly confident, almost victims of our own skill. This was the 25th shuttle mission, missions that are now viewed as routine. We've forgotten the dangers involved and we've forgotten that danger is the lot of those willing to work on the edge of discovery and push the boundaries of knowledge further.

We are still explorers in space. Our lost astronauts were following in that tradition of exploration and we will long remember them and their contributions to our explorations.

The human spirit has been enriched by exploration of the unknown throughout the ages. We cannot let this tragedy slow our enthusiasm for space exploration. I'm confident that those who died so tragically would want the Space Program to continue. Benefits for generations to come will flow from the discoveries we make in our explorations of space.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, it is with great sorrow that I rise to reflect on the event which occurred at Cape Canaveral, FL, this morning. The explosion of the space shuttle Challenger, with the deaths of the seven astronauts, is a tragedy which touches the hearts of all Americans.

I stand with my colleagues in the U.S. Senate and citizens across the country in extending my deepest sympathy to the families and friends of Comdr. Dick Scobee, Ellison Onizuka, Gregory Jarvis, Judith Resnik, Michael Smith, Ronald McNair, and schoolteacher Sharon Christa McAuliffe.

Ever since Neil Armstrong's small step for man and giant leap for mankind in 1969, the United States has been at the forefront of the exploration of space. Our satellite Voyager 2 has stretched the bounds of human knowledge with information and photographs of Uranus and its surrounding moons. America's Space Shuttle Program has also served a vital role in the development of medical and other technologies. With the continued growth of the Space Shuttle Program, we will be able to realize our goal of permanent, manned space stations orbiting the Earth.

As we reap the benefits of advancing our technological base, we must be ready to acknowledge the vast responsibilities that accompany these benefits. It is my hope that these seven heroes, who gave their lives for a valiant purpose, should inspire America to work even more diligently for a safe and successful space program.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I rise to join my colleagues in expressing the grief of our Nation over the loss of the seven members of the shuttle Challenger.

So many times we have watched with pride the majestic launch of a shuttle. Today, many of us watched with a sickening sense of horror the tragedy which unfolded off the Florida coast.

Mr. President, the thoughts and prayers of all Americans are with the families of the Challenger's crew who sacrificed their lives to expand the boundaries of human knowledge. We are all, I think, especially saddened by the loss of Christa McAuliffe, and wish we could bear in some measure the dreadful shock to her husband and two little children who must have been filled with such eager anticipation and pride until the awful moment of tragedy. Christa McAuliffe represented ordinary Americans and the promise of what space travel could become for future generations. Her death is a particularly grievous blow to the national psyche and brings home what is true of the six other members of the crew as well: these were our fellow Americans who were performing a dangerous job to broaden opportunities for all of us.

Throughout history, humans have tried to express the unexpressable with symbolic actions meant to convey respect and grief for those whom we have lost. It is, therefore, fitting that the Senate stand in recess today to express our collective sorrow and as a tribute to the Challenger's crew.

MOURNING THE LOSS OF "CHALLENGER'S" CREW

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I am so deeply shocked by the tragedy which took place at the Kennedy Space Center today that I am unable to find adequately words to express my sadness. Inadequate as it may be, let me say Mr. President, that we are a nation in mourning across the breadth of this great country of ours—from Concord, NH, hometown of Ms. Christa McAuliffe, to Kealakekua, HI, birthplace of Lt. Col. Ellison S. Onizuka. As the shuttle drew upon our diversity in recruiting its crew, so does this national tragedy bring us together in mourning their loss.

The seven crew members of the U.S. space shuttle Challenger were embarking on a landmark mission—one which was to have launched into space, the first civilian, Ms. McAuliffe, a schoolteacher. It was also to have been the second flight for Hawaii-born astronaut, U.S. Air Force Lt. Col. Ellison S. Onizuka.

As one who views space exploration as a key to our world's continued search for peace, I join with all who mourn the tragic loss of the brave crew who sacrificed their all in a mission for peace.

Mr. President, as it was so penetratingly observed by William Shakespeare many years ago, we mortals know no real pain until we have lost a child. As the father of five children, I can sense the grief with which Mrs. Mitsue Onizuka of Keopu, HI, mother of Colonel Onizuka, must be overcome. No less grief stricken must be Ellison's widow Lorna Leiko and his two daughters, Janelle Mitsue, age 16, and Darien Lei Shizue, age 10. To them I extend my heartfelt condolences and deepest sympathy. As a personal friend of Ellison, I share their immeasurable loss, and pray that the good Lord will bestow his blessings upon them in their bereavement.

I offer that same fervent prayer in behalf of the surviving love ones and families of Christa McAuliffe, Francis (Dick) Scobee, Michael Smith, Judith Resnik, Arnold McNair, and Gregory Jarvis.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, the terrible tragedy in the skies over Cape Canaveral this morning, the explosion of the space shuttle Challenger, has left the American people shocked and grief-stricken over the loss of seven brave lives. Our first thoughts, our prayers, are with the astronauts' families. The horror they must have suffered at seeing the fireball ignite overhead can only be imagined by the rest of us. The Nation waited together for the news we hoped would not come: NASA crews have advised this afternoon that there is no evidence that any of the crew have survived.

An added dimension to the terrible events of this morning was felt in an auditorium in a New Hampshire school, where hundreds of Christa McAuliffe's students, friends and fellow teachers waited in excited anticipation of their new heroine's bold adventure. Comdr. Dick Scobee; Pilot Michael Smith; Mission Specialists Dr. Ronald McNair, Dr. Judy Resnik, Lt. Col. Ellison Onizuka; and Payload Specialists Gregory Jarvis and Christa McAuliffe—more noted as the first teacher in space—were all members of the Challenger's crew this morning on mission STS-51L, the 25th launch of the space shuttle.

It had been 19 years since a disaster of these proportions had struck the Space Program, and I think we had come to be comfortable with the inevitability of success.

The calm confidence with which this mission team approached the launch has been a hallmark of the astronaut program from the outset. Their training, their readiness, the reserves of inner strength they brought to the task belied the dangers. The program's early days were no more full of danger than today, but they were more full of doubt. This morning's launch was to be another in a long line of successful launches—almost bordering on the routine in the public mind.

We have had false starts, on this mission and on earlier missions. The national impatience with delays gave way to a grudging acknowledgment that all systems had to be as perfect as human beings could make them before giving a go for launch.

And that is the key point: As perfect as human beings could make them. There will be investigations. There will be review boards. Every shred of information, every piece of data, will be examined in full detail. We may or may not have final answers on the precise cause of the disaster this morning. What we will have, what we have always had, is the certainty that the best scientific and engineering talent in this country will be dedicated to the task. It is not that these dedicated experts have failed, it is not that the United States has failed; the truth is that no human endeavor is immune from imperfection.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, what a sadness! Today, all Americans grieve for the loss of seven brave astronauts who died in the service of our country. These soldiers of exploration, no less than America's soldiers who have fallen in battle, gave their fellow citizens "the last full measure of devotion."

Today, all of us hurt for the families and friends of Challenger's crew. We all hurt for the students in Christa McAuliffe's class. We hurt for the thousands of devoted public servants and private citizens who have labored to make America's Space Program one of the proudest achievements of human history. Each of them and each of us has lost something which was very much a part of our national character and our individual dreams.

There are times of great success and great tragedy that stand as lonely mileposts in America's history. Surely, all of us who were of age remember what we were doing when John Kennedy was murdered. All of us remember what we were doing when his promise of landing a man on the Moon was realized. In the same way, none of us will ever forget what we were doing when today's tragic news first reached us.

The crewmembers of this space shuttle mission truly were American heroes. Each of them represented the best of America's idealism, courage, commitment, and patriotism. Although we have today lost these seven brave pioneers, we will never forget the pioneering spirit they carried upward on behalf of their Nation.

Benjamin Mays once said: "The tragedy of life doesn't lie in not reaching you goal. The tragedy lies in having no goal to reach. It is not a disgrace not to reach the stars, but it is a disgrace to have no stars to reach for." The world will always remember that these seven were reaching for the stars, and that is why their loss gives us such great sorrow.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I was greatly shocked and saddened by the explosion of the space shuttle Challenger during launch this morning. I extend my deepest sympathies to the families and friends of those on board.

I am especially regretful of the apparent loss of a fellow South Carolinian, Dr. Ronald McNair of Lake City. He visited with me in my Washington office recently, and I feel a deep personal loss because of today's tragedy.

Dr. McNair had previously flown as the mission specialist on the February 1984, Challenger flight. This particular flight was noted for the first use of the Canadian arm, which Dr. McNair himself operated.

Upon graduation from Carver High School in Lake City, SC, in 1967, Ron McNair entered North Carolina A&T State College, where he earned a B.S. degree in physics. In 1976 he earned his doctor of philosophy of physics from Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He was later awarded three honorary degrees, the lastest from the University of South Carolina in 1984.

He and his wife, Sheryl, had more recently resided in New Jersey with their two children, Reginald Ervin and Joy Cheray. My thoughts and prayers are with them today and with his parents, Mrs. Pearl McNair of Lake City, and Mr. Carl McNair of New York.

At our recent meeting, Dr. McNair expressed his boundless enthusiasm and confidence in our country's space program, and I can think of no better tribute to his memory than the continuation of our research of the vast frontiers of space.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, the tragic loss of life in the first space flight disaster is a very personal loss to millions of Americans.

There is something about the exploration of our last frontier that deeply and profoundly touches the American psyche and our spirit of adventure.

This accident has special significance to me because I tried to get into the Space Program during my years as a pilot in the Navy. I even took the series of tests that the earlier Mercury astronauts took—and did quite well—but there were no openings when I applied. I was struck and fascinated by the challenge and wonder of space flight and applied to NASA again, but finished my tour of duty before my name ever came up on the list.

The Challenger tragedy should not deter us from our goal of space exploration and space flight just as past tragedies did not deter the pioneers of aviation from moving forward. We should not forget that each innovation in the history of aviation was accompanied by personal tragedy, accidents, and loss of human life. The amazing safety record and successes of NASA and our Space Program has allowed us to forget that fact.

We grieve with the families of those who died today but we should not abandon the mission which those seven Americans gave their lives.

Let us renew and redouble our commitment to conquer this last frontier.

ORDER FOR RECORD TO REMAIN OPEN UNTIL 5 P.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD remain open to 5 p.m. today for the insertion of statements by all Members regarding today's tragic loss.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

POSTPONEMENT OF STATE OF THE UNION MESSAGE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate receives the concurrent resolution from the House setting the time for the State of the Union message, it be deemed considered and agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. I am advised that resolution will contain the date Tuesday, February 4, at 9 p.m. Mr. President, the only thing remaining is the resolution to recess, and I will do that as quickly as I can.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE BRETTON WOODS COMMITTEE

HON. CHARLES McC. MATHIAS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the Bretton Woods Committee is a necessary organization to bring reason to the troubled world of international finance. In the process it helps to educate Americans on the subject of their vital interest in economic development of Third World countries and the essential role in that process played by the multilateral financial institutions.

The Bretton Woods Committee convened a remarkable meeting in Washington last week to review and discuss the developments in the world that influence and are influenced by the economy. Speakers included the Secretary of the Treasury, James A. Baker III, the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, Jacques de Larosiére, and the President of the World Bank, A.W. Clausen.

I ask that a copy of the texts of these speeches be printed in the RECORD.

The texts of the speeches follow:

THE INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS: THE CHALLENGES AHEAD

(Remarks by Hon. James A. Baker III, Secretary of the Treasury)

I am pleased to have this opportunity to join you here today. The task you have undertaken—to explain the workings and significance of the Bretton Woods institutions to our fellow citizens—remains as important, and as difficult, as ever. But your activities are needed and appreciated. One of my reasons for wanting to join you at your annual meeting is to urge you to keep up the fine work you have done in the past.

For forty years, since the original Bretton Woods meetings, the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development have been focal points for the international community's efforts to facilitate and promote soundly based growth and development of the world economy. Over these years, not only has their role been important, but their record has been impressive. Yet it is in the past dozen years or so, as the world has experienced the oil crises of the 1970s and the debt crisis of the early 1980s, that these institutions have made their greatest contributions. Without the Bretton Woods institutions, we would certainly have emerged from these crises a poorer, more fragmented, less hopeful world.

Despite the fact that the international financial institutions have been playing an increasingly critical role, it must be acknowledged that public support has declined. One of the reasons may be the increasingly intense competition for federal budgetary resources. If so, the climate will hardly be more benign in the coming years than it has been in the past.

While I can hope the shocks of international economic crises are behind us, I know the problems we face are not. We will continue to need these institutions, and we will continue to need your help in mobilizing support for them.

The American public must understand that it is not just the rest of the world (nor just the developing countries) that would be the poorer without the international financial institutions—the American public would be poorer, as well. The impact on U.S. exports of the debt-related economic downturn in Latin America and other developing countries may have brought this realization home to many people. Still, the message that growth in the developing world affects the level of employment here needs to be more widely understood.

Looking ahead, I see two main challenges to which the international financial institutions must respond. These institutions must play a major role in implementing the proposed "Program for Sustained Growth" in developing nations that lies at the heart of the current phase of our global debt strategy. Secondly, the International Monetary Fund remains at the center of our efforts to improve the functioning and stability of the international monetary system.

Your Committee's recent policy statement is a welcome contribution to the discussion in these areas, and I would like to share with you the Administration's latest thinking.

THE DEBT SITUATION

Since the debt crisis emerged in 1982, considerable progress has been made in reducing the substantial current account deficits of the major debtor nations. The decline in growth in most of these countries has been reversed, and imports are increasing once again. However, progress in reducing domestic imbalances has been less impressive, and more needs to be done to assure a firm foundation for sustainable growth. Net commercial bank lending to support these efforts in the principal debtor countries has declined significantly, from $25 billion in 1982 to virtually no new new lending in 1985.

As you know, at the Annual Meetings of the Bank and the Fund in Seoul last October, the United States proposed a "Program for Sustained Growth" that involved mutually reinforcing actions by debtor nations, the IMF and the multilateral development banks, and commercial banks. The response has been very positive and encouraging. We have received broad statements of support from the U.S. banking community and key foreign banks, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, and the Inter-American Development Bank, as well as positive responses from a number of the debtor nations.

Where do we go from here?

For the multilateral development banks, the next step will be enactment of reforms to streamline procedures and to enhance disbursements of loans conditioned for policy reforms.

We expect to see a growing stream of policy-based structural and sectoral adjustment loans from the World Bank and a strengthened emphasis on privatization, open markets, and increased savings and investment. The suggestion in your policy statement on developing capital markets should fit well with the Bank's efforts in this direction. We believe there should be both debt and equity market development, with the latter designed to facilitate the privatization process.

Total lending by the Bank in 1986 should be about $2 billion higher than in 1985, with the share of policy-based loans rising substantially, concentrated in the principal debtor countries. The regional development banks should provide an additional increment of $1 billion in lending in 1986.

We anticipate that adoption of reforms to support structural change in borrowing countries, well coordinated with the IMF, will be a key element in the negotiations for the Eighth Replenishment of the International Development Association which begin later this month.

We will also be working closely with the Inter-American Development Bank to encourage necessary procedural and policy reforms to support the U.S. initiative.

The IMF is already considering how to implement the kinds of reforms we are proposing, including greater emphasis on supply-side measures to help mobilize domestic savings and investment and on market-opening measures.

The banking community will need to devise its own mechanisms for implementing its commitment to increase net lending to support growth-oriented measures in the developing countries. We have a pledge of support from U.S. banks that account for 95 percent of exposure to the countries in question. Pledges of support from the banking industries in other countries have also been made directly to the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

Finally, and most importantly, we must now look to the debtor countries themselves to adopt the essential economic measures to carry out the U.S. proposal. This won't happen overnight, nor can we expect all of the principal debtor nations to pursue identical paths in this regard.

Some nations, such as Argentina and Mexico, have already begun, or will need, full-fledged negotiations with the IMF and the World Bank, which may take some time.

Other countries, such as Ecuador, Colombia, the Ivory Coast, Morocco and Uruguay, already have new bank financing, debt rescheduling and IMF programs in place, and are now in the process of negotiating additional structural or sectoral loan programs with the World Bank.

Ecuador, which signed a large World Bank loan last week, is an excellent example of a country that is adopting the sound economic policies that are fundamental to the approach we have proposed, and we hope others will follow.

We can continue to expect that implementation of the overall effort will be governed by the pace and type of negotiations by each individual debtor nation on economic programs with the IMF and the World Bank.

IMPROVING THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY SYSTEM

A second challenge lying ahead of us is to advance our efforts to improve the international monetary system. The current system, in particular its flexibility, served us well as we passed through a period of global economic shocks. Its basic structure remains valid. At the same time, the system has been less stable than we would have liked, and exchange rate movements have been one factor—though not the only one—contributing to protectionist pressures.

In approaching the task of improving the international monetary system, I have found there is a near consensus that the key to stability is to encourage convergence of favorable economic performance among the major industrialized nations. The fundamental outstanding issue is how to encourage sovereign nations to pursue, in the words of your policy statement, "mutually consistent and reinforcing policies." At a minimum, we have to develop a more effective means of assuring that the international implications of domestic policies are taken into account.

As the center of our framework for international economic and financial cooperation, the IMF clearly has a central role to play, and our broad objective is to make the Fund more effective. The April meeting of its Interim Committee will have before it the reports of the Group of Ten and the Group of Twenty-Four on improving the international monetary system. These reports provide suggestions for improving the exchange rate system, international surveillance, arrangements concerning international liquidity, and the role of the IMF.

While these issues are almost always complex and often politically difficult, the recent accomplishments of the Group of Five constitute an encouraging sign that progress in key areas is possible. The agreement they reached last September in New York demonstrates the willingness of these key countries to collaborate regarding their policy intentions in order to foster increased and more balanced growth and to ensure that exchange rates more fully reflect underlying economic fundamentals.

Since September, the exchange markets have clearly recognized that better convergence of economic performance has taken place and is in prospect. For its part, the U.S. has moved to implement the policy actions set forth in that agreement. We have begun to put in place a program for reducing our budget deficit, made meaningful progress on tax reform, and continued to resist protectionist pressures firmly. Even if in some instances actions have not always been as fast and forceful as one might hope, the other participants in the G-5 are also moving to implement the New York agreement.

However, we recognize that work on improving the international monetary system must continue. We will patiently pursue our efforts to improve arrangements for international economic and financial cooperation.

The challenges now facing the Bank and Fund will make your work in explaining to the American public how the institutions operate even more important. And we are very grateful for the important service you are performing for your country. Thank you.

THE ROLE OF THE IMF IN THE PRESENT INTERNATIONAL SCENE

(Remarks by J. de Larosière, Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund)

It has been a year since I last had the pleasure of meeting with you. It has been an eventful period. The year was characterized by a number of difficulties in the world economy which had implications for the management of the debt problems. But it ended on a distinctly positive note—with several manifestations of a new resolve to tackle the problems facing the world economy in a cooperative and constructive way. The new developments involve a continued pivotal role for the Fund, in close association with the World Bank, in paving the way to a resolution of the debt problems and toward a more dynamic world economy.

1. THE WORLD ECONOMIC SITUATION

Developments in the world economy last year were marked by a number of difficulties. First and foremost, growth in the industrial countries slowed down—from about 5 percent in 1984 to around 3 percent. This was accompanied by a deceleration in the rate of growth of world trade to about 4 percent, less than half the rate recorded in 1984. These developments were, in turn, reflected in reduced growth of developing countries' export volumes and a further weakening of commodity prices. Export earnings of the LDCs—excluding the major oil exporters—were flat last year, having risen by 12 percent in 1984. This put increased strain on indebted countries seeking to meet their heavy debt servicing obligations. It also restricted their growth in output.

A second concern has been in the realm of international financing. Net new lending by commercial banks to developing countries has all but stopped. While it was inevitable, and indeed essential, for the banks to scale back their lending from the unsustainable rates recorded up to 1981, the recent trend has been toward a too-rapid disengagement—one that if not reversed could undermine the efforts of countries making progress toward adjustment. Despite some positive developments since 1984, including for example, the multiyear rescheduling agreements for Mexico, Venezuela, and Ecuador, and a decline in interest rates, there has been great difficulty in putting together some recent financing packages, such as those for Chile and Uruguay.

A final area of concern relates to the situation and policies of the developing countries themselves. Despite the remarkable improvement in external positions over the past few years, policy adjustments in many countries are still incomplete. One indication of this is given by the fact that inflation remains much too high in many developing countries and has been getting worse. Another is that much of the improvement in current account positions of developing countries has come from reduction in imports and investment; increases in exports and in savings need to make a larger contribution if external adjustment is to be combined with growth. In short, a desire for growth and stability is not enough: the conditions and policies necessary to achieve it need to be put in place in the developing countries themselves.

2. REINFORCING THE DEBT STRATEGY

It was against this background that the Annual Meetings of the Fund and the Bank took place in Seoul last October. The dominant theme of those discussions was how to restore the momentum of growth in the developing countries in such a way that it will be sustained and will permit continued progress toward overcoming their external financial difficulties.

The Seoul meetings served to reaffirm several important aspects of the present debt strategy—the case-by-case approach; the need for adjustment and financing to go hand-in-hand; and the importance of cooperative action on the part of all parties. There was a clear recognition on the part of industrial and developing countries alike that sound domestic policies and orderly international financing were essential ingredients of a successful resolution of the debt problems. National authorities and financial institutions shared a common responsibility in meeting this challenge. The emphasis on shared responsibility in assuring the continued success of the debt strategy was strongly stressed in the discussions.

But the key development at the Seoul meetings was a consensus on the need for reinforcing the debt strategy. As you know, Treasury Secretary Baker unveiled a constructive and comprehensive set of proposals based on three elements:

The adoption by principal debtor countries of comprehensive macroeconomic and structural policies, geared to promoting growth and balance of payments adjustment, and to reducing inflation.

A continued central role for the IMF, in conjunction with increased and more effective structural adjustment lending by the multilateral development banks, in support of the adoption by principal debtors of market-oriented policies for growth, and

A call on commercial banks to support these growth-oriented adjustment programs by lending new money—to the tune of $20 billion over the next three years for an indicative group of 15 major debtor countries.

The Baker initiative has received considerable support from the Fund membership at large and from commercial banks in North America, Europe, Japan, and Saudi Arabia. In a recent discussion at the Fund's Executive Board, the initiative was seen as an important signal to the international community and as a timely step toward renewing the momentum in dealing with the debt problems and toward providing a constructive framework within which to act.

In responding to the U.S. proposals, commercial banks in the major financial centers, accounting for an overwhelming majority of the claims on indebted countries, have welcomed Secretary Baker's initiative and have confirmed their willingness to play their part in the implementation of the debt strategy, on a case-by-case basis, in collaboration with all other participants. A resumption of net new lending by commercial banks is in the common interest of the banks and their country-clients: higher lending will facilitate the adjustment efforts being undertaken while, at the same time, increasing the quality of the banks' own assets.

3. THE ROLE OF THE FUND

I now come to the final subject of my remarks—the role of the Fund.

To begin with, the Fund will have an important role to play in the formulation and implementation of the reinforced strategy. The Fund is working with the membership, the World Bank, and the commercial banks in seeking to translate the Baker initiative into concrete action. If we want more growth, we can't only rely on external financing. We will need more investment, more exports, and greater economic efficiency. That can only be brought about with more domestic savings, better incentives for exporting, and more competition. This in turn implies the right policies on the fiscal, monetary, exchange rate, and supply sides. The Fund will continue to play a key role in assisting members to establish a macroeconomic framework that can combine durable growth and adjustment. A review of the supply-side aspects of programs is being undertaken by the Fund in connection with the current review of conditionality. We are also strengthening further and intensifying our already close collaboration with the World Bank in helping countries formulate comprehensive economic programs needed to promote growth and attract external financing. There can be no doubt that the success of the strategy will depend heavily on the closeness and effectiveness of the cooperation between the two Bretton Woods institutions.

The Fund will also continue to play an important role in the financing of the system. Given the heavy lending by the Fund over the past few years and the revolving nature of its financing, the Fund's role as a financial catalyst will assume added importance. As you know, the Board has taken action to reduce marginally the ceilings under the Fund's enlarged access policy: the annual limits have been reduced from 95 percent to 90 percent of quota, and the cumulative limit scaled down from 408 percent to 400 percent. (Access limits under the special facilities are unchanged.) Nevertheless, the Fund still retains the necessary flexibility to help member countries finance their balance of payments deficits.

Also, the necessary papers are now before the Board to put into effect the agreement reached in Seoul on the use of the Trust Fund reflows. Those reflows are estimated to amount to about $2.7 billion over the next five years, and will be made available to support programs of structural adjustment and growth in low-income countries facing protracted payments problems. India and China, which have large quotas, and would have been eligible for a large share of these resources, agreed to abstain from utilizing them. This is very important because it is going to mean that the entire amount can be concentrated on the smaller poor countries, particularly in Africa, which are saddled with structural balance of payments and debt problems.

Of course, the Fund's role in the international monetary system extends beyond that of assisting members in devising economic programs and providing financial support. We also have a central responsibility to promote the effective operation of the international monetary system. In this regard, the Executive Board will be giving detailed consideration in the immediate future to two reports on the functioning of the international monetary system—one by the Group of Ten industrial countries, and the other by the Group of Twenty-four developing countries. This will provide the basis for a full discussion at next April's meeting of the Interim Committee. Both reports lay stress on the need to make Fund surveillance more symmetrical and effective, with the aim of achieving better economic convergence among major countries and thus of fostering more stable international monetary conditions and a better climate for growth. Widespread support was expressed at Seoul for this approach as well as for the commitments and intentions stated by the five major industrial countries following their meeting in New York on September 22, to strengthen their cooperation in order to achieve a better and more stable pattern of exchange rates.

The policy agenda is full. Economic growth has to be consolidated, both in industrial and developing countries; efforts to improve policies need to be sustained; and financial flows to indebted countries have to be increased. At the same time, we must seek to strengthen the international monetary system and we must give effect to the commitments that have been made to resist protectionism. In my view, the Seoul meetings were very positive. They reflected a strong spirit of solidarity among the membership and a resolve to act together, within the framework of the Bretton Woods institutions, to overcome the problems now facing us. Our task now is to build on this spirit and translate it into concrete action. The support of your Committee will be a valuable element in the fulfillment of this task.

Priority Issues on the World Bank's Agenda

(Remarks by A.W. Clausen, President, The World Bank and International Finance Corporation)

Good morning ladies and gentlemen, the first order of business is a word of congratulations. The Bretton Woods Committee has completed its first year, and already it is firmly established. You have seized opportunities to speak clearly and frankly about the international economic issues of the day. You have advanced public understanding of the Bretton Woods institutions through your diligent work with the media and the Congress. We are most grateful to you for these efforts, and we would urge you to build upon this impressive beginning, expanding the unique and important role which your organization has proved itself so capable of performing.

This is an exceptionally well informed audience and I feel it would be more productive today if we had an exchange of views, rather than a long monologue from me. So, I will be brief in these opening remarks, concentrating on some of the key priorities that are at the top of The World Bank's agenda—most notably our strategies to assist the highly indebted nations; our work with other middle-income nations; our support for urgently needed development progress among the poorest nations, which is to say the role of IDA; and our commitment to private sector development through the work of the International Finance Corporation and our new Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency.

Permit me to begin with the highly indebted nations and The World Bank's response to their difficulties. The members of the Bretton Woods Committee need no introduction to this issue—indeed, you have already produced an excellent policy statement on the subject.

So, you will recall that in Seoul, at our last annual meeting, the Bank's shareholders reached agreement that the Bank should play an enhanced role in assisting the highly indebted, middle-income nations to move forward on a development path that would secure growth and restore creditworthiness. Secretary Baker played a leading part in forging that new consensus on the debt problem, and we are most grateful to the United States for stressing the importance of a resumption of growth in the highly indebted countries and for placing such confidence in The World Bank as a major participant in the international debt strategy. Our long experience in promoting growth throughout the developing world makes us very willing and, let me say, capable partners in this effort.

The new consensus on the debt issue that emerged at Seoul grew from a recognition that our efforts to ease the debt problem were being hindered by some unfavorable, unexpected developments. The robust U.S. recovery did not endure, commodity prices remained flat, and the expected flows of new money did not come forth from the commercial banks.

All of this has left the highly indebted nations turning in a vicious circle. Their heavy debt service obligations take away resources needed for domestic investment. The resulting shortfall of investment activity precludes a significant expansion of export capacity to generate additional foreign exchange. Debt payments remain an overwhelming burden, which in turn diminishes economic prospects and investor confidence. Commercial banks shy away and domestic capital flies off to more hospitable climes. And there is no economic growth.

Our discussions in Seoul have put the issue sharply in focus: without new sources of capital the heavily indebted countries will fall deeper into a low investment—low growth trap. In order to escape that trap, the heavily-indebted countries will need cooperative, concerted action from all participants in an expanded international debt strategy. This means that the indebted countries themselves, the industrial economies, the commercial banks, and the multilateral development banks each have their respective responsibilities. The World Bank takes its role very seriously.

But I want to point out that our sense of urgency on the debt problem did not originate in Seoul. Well before that meeting we put together creative lending programs for several highly indebted Latin American countries. In Colombia, for example, we supported the government's trade liberalization initiative with a $300 million loan, and our monitoring of Colombia's trade policy is associated with the provision of new money by commercial banks. We have forged similar cooperative lending arrangements with Costa Rica, Chile, and Uruguay.

Building on this firm base of experience, our work on the debt issue has accelerated sharply.

We are pressing ahead with extensive planning and analysis activities. We are redeploying staff to enhance our capabilities as our coordinating function in the debt strategy grows. We are more directly engaging commercial banks in the process and more dynamically entering into discussions with our borrowers. And let me assure you that our coordination with the IMF is being developed even further. The will to secure this on both sides of Nineteenth Street is very great.

Our special capability in this enhanced international strategy lies in our close relationship with the countries themselves. Through our knowledge of those countries and the mature quality of our policy dialogue, we have and we will continue to help them work out the necessary changes in economic policy. Three basic areas must be addressed—first, an increase in the rate of growth of savings, both in the private and public sector. Without new domestic savings, productive new investment will be very difficult to attain. Second, there must be an improvement in economic efficiency, particularly the use of capital if a high growth strategy is to be affordable. And finally, exports must increase in order to win back the creditworthiness which has ebbed away in recent years.

To take one specific example from the many countries we are actively working with, Argentina faces some daunting problems. Interest payments on external debt now absorbs some 40 percent of gross domestic savings compared to less than 5 percent in the early 1970s. While the external debt increased, domestic production declined. In 1985, real GDP per capita was 13 percent below the 1974 level, and investment fell off too, from 21 percent of GDP to 13 percent last year.

What can Argentina do to reverse this decline? First, a continuation of its policy of monetary and fiscal reform is a necessary precondition for any program. Second, positive economic growth must be restored. Third, per capita consumption must steadily improve in order to maintain the social and political consensus behind the program. And last, the ratio of debt to exports must be brought down to levels where foreign capital will be willing to play a more normal role in the economy.

We are engaged in a vigorous, uninterrupted dialogue with Argentina and we are fully confident that an enhanced financial relationship will ensue, perhaps similar to our evolving work with Ecuador.

Just last week we signed two significant growth oriented adjustment loans to Ecuador, with the President of that country in attendance. These are the first in a series of loans which will strengthen that nation's ability to secure growth, to enhance domestic economic efficiency and, over time, create a far greater capacity to manage external debt obligations.

In December, I visited Ecuador, Uruguay and Argentina. My discussions with Latin American leaders were fruitful, and the expressed willingness of their governments to take tough actions in order to secure better long-term growth prospects was most encouraging.

Our discussions with indebted country governments are progressing well, and I assure you that the results of our current activities will become increasingly, publicly evident over the next twelve months. But let me make two very important points here. The first concerns the mechanics of our negotiations—they are country-by-country. Each indebted nation has its own distinctive situation which requires highly customized attention. Today's debt problems will not be erased with a single sweeping gesture, but resolved step-by-step and case-by-case.

My second point on country negotiations is this. Adjustment lending on the scale we envision and in association with the thorough economic restructuring that will be required will not be embraced or arranged overnight. Our experience in this sort of operation is well developed, and we have found that sovereign nations negotiate such loans with extreme care. They face political and economic dilemmas just as sensitive and just as intractable as those which we face right here in our own country.

So let us not build up naive expectations. We do have the will of the leaders of most of these nations to act swiftly, but political realities demand time for the process of economic analysis, policy formulation, loan negotiation and program completion to unfold.

If we push for instant results and swift conclusions, we will risk an impasse that will be damaging for all: damaging to the hopes for recovery in the countries themselves and damaging to the high quality of our lending which our shareholders and investors have come to regard so highly. Let there be no question that our negotiations with borrowers will proceed on an urgent basis, but we insist that the pace be measured and the results be of the highest quality.

The World Bank's coordinating role has also involved us in frequent discussions with commercial bankers who, as you know, are very key players in this cooperative strategy. We feel that the willingness of the commercial banks to provide more financing to the indebted countries will rest very squarely on the progress of adjustment in the indebted countries, the quality of that adjustment, and its orientation to growth. My discussions with both bankers and developing country leaders in recent weeks make me confident that the required cooperation will be obtained.

Thus, we are geared up to play three distinct roles, and the work has begun. First, we will be assisting in the formulation of country growth programs and will be helping in the monitoring of their progress. Second, we will be providing an expanded volume of capital necessary to support the programs. Third, we will be acting as a catalyst in the mobilizing of capital from other sources.

We are already making excellent progress given the complexity of this many-sided effort. And we want all of our friends in the Bretton Woods Committee to understand how determined we are to see this debt strategy work and how confident we are that we can build on the progress already made.

It might seem from all the recent attention paid to the problem of the highly indebted nations that The World Bank has given up its project lending in the rest of the middle-income countries. This, of course, is not the case. To sustain growth and balanced development in these relatively unburdened countries is another key priority on our agenda. From China to Turkey to Indonesia and Tunisia our lending activities are moving ahead. Indeed, overall we see IBRD commitments this year totalling between $12 to $13.5 billion, compared to $11.4 billion last year. And our work in progress, the pipeline as we call it, leaves little doubt that in our next fiscal year still higher levels of commitments will be reached.

This growth in IBRD lending will continue, and before long, we will face limitations on that growth imposed by the amount of our capital and reserves. I therefore want to reiterate to this influential audience, that the IBRD will need, in time, a general capital increase.

Let me turn now to our concessional financing affiliate, and that is IDA, the International Development Association. It is no secret to this audience that the replenishment of IDA's resources has not always been trouble-free. IDA's 33 donor nations agreed to a $9 billion total in 1984, a sum $3 billion less than the previous replenishment and frankly a disappointment, not only for IDA's borrowers in Africa and Asia, but for many donors as well. At the conclusion of those negotiations, there was a palpable sense among donors of a job not fully done.

Africa's relentless economic decline has been a grim reminder of the need for a strong IDA, and early last year donors established the Special Africa Facility as a response to the crisis. To date $1.4 billion has been pledged, and we are appreciative of the recent appropriation by the United States to this Facility. Next Monday the IDA Deputies will meet in Paris. They will look at the terms and conditions of IDA's credits; they will look at the geographical distribution of IDA's assistance, and they will discuss the policy orientation of IDA lending.

We are hopeful that the IDA donors will recognize that the resources we now have, through IDA and the Africa Facility, fall seriously short of what is needed by the poorest countries. They must understand that in Africa the needs for adjustment finance are much longer term than the three-year life of the Facility. And in addition to the investments needed in human resource development, poverty alleviation and basic infrastructure, one of IDA's more urgent tasks will be to address the emerging debt problems of many poorer countries in the developing world.

Let us be candid here. We cannot rely in the future on ad hoc, one-shot special facilities to make up for funding shortfalls in the IDA replenishments. This is not a complaint, but an appeal for pragmatism. To meet the need of all of our poorer country members, including the growing volume of adjustment lending, it will be far more effective to rely on a long established, proven instrument, and provide it with sufficient resources to do the job well. And that means we will need to equip IDA with resources which exceed the total of IDA VII and the Special Africa Facility contributions.

Let me add that Secretary Baker has outlined ideas for additional concessional flows in association with the IMF Trust Fund—we are working to develop this most constructive initiative.

IDA's replenishment and the Bank's full response to the needs of our middle-income countries are two of our highest priorities, but they are closely followed by issues crucial to the future of private sector development and deeply deserving of your continuing support—that is the future of MIGA and the IFC.

Last year, we were very gratified with the decision of our Board of Governors to approve the convention establishing the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency or MIGA. MIGA will promote private investment for development through its coverage against the risks of adverse currency situations, political violence, and expropriation. Through those coverages and an array of advisory and intermediary services, we expect MIGA to substantially improve the investment climate in participating developing countries.

To bring the MIGA convention into force, we will need the signatures of five industrialized countries and fifteen developing countries. Six developing countries have already signed the convention and more are expected shortly. They are Korea, Turkey, Ecuador, Senegal, Sierra Leone, and St. Lucia. The United States has announced its intention to seek Congressional authorization of U.S. participation in MIGA; and we expect the Administration to move in the near term. United States leadership will be emulated by others, thereby moving up MIGA's first day of operation to the nearest possible date. Your vigorous support of this issue is indispensable.

Our commitment to private sector development is also in evidence with the expanding activities of the International Finance Corporation. The IFC's Board has approved a doubling of its capital to $1.3 billion. And last year, the United States Congress appropriated $29 million as a first installment on the American allocation of $175 million.

We are very pleased with that outcome but we should not be complacent. The Graham-Rudman procedures recently enacted by Congress will certainly be a factor in further installments, and therefore we must make clear how important it is to maintain the commitment to contribute the full U.S. allocation of IFC's capital increase, even if it means stretching out payments somewhat to meet budgetary targets. As in the case of MIGA, the U.S role must be one of unquestioned leadership in the expansion of IFC's capital, and we hope to see that leadership role sustained for the strengthening of the IFC.

Ladies and gentlemen, we have set before you today the priority issues on our agenda as we see them. Against a backdrop of an uncertain economic climate in the industrial countries no one in this room can underestimate the degree of difficulty we face in these challenges. But The World Bank is stronger now than ever before to confront its responsibilities. Our liquidity is high, the management of our investment portfolio is efficient, and we recently borrowed at the finest spreads ever over the cost of government obligations.

So let there be no uncertainties concerning the financial strengths of The World Bank, and let me assure you that in close partnership with the International Monetary Fund we will play to the full the major roles we and our shareholders have set for ourselves. And with your support and encouragement, we are confident that we will succeed.

Thank you. And now I will be pleased to hear your comments and questions.●

THE FEDERAL EMPLOYEES BENEFITS IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1986

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Federal Employees Benefits Improvement Act of 1986. Joining me as original cosponsors are Congressmen WILLIAM FORD, GENE TAYLOR, JOHN MEYERS, DON YOUNG, STENY HOYER, MIKE BARNES, Congresswoman BARBARA MIKULSKI, and Congressmen FRANK WOLF and STAN PARRIS. I want to commend them for their support for this bill, and for their untiring efforts on behalf of Federal workers.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is similar to a bill I introduced last fall, H.R. 3384, which was vetoed by the President on January 17, 1986. I was surprised and deeply disappointed by the President's veto of H.R. 3384. That bill would have enabled Federal employees and annuitants to receive refunds from their health insurance plans. In addition, it included many other important changes in the Federal health insurance and retirement programs.

Members in the House and Senate worked together with the administration in a spirit of bipartisan cooperation to develop H.R. 3384. The legislation was supported by numerous associations and employee organizations. H.R. 3384 should have been enacted: it had widespread support in both bodies; but it was vetoed.

As a result, millions of Federal employees and retirees are still counting on the reforms that were in H.R. 3384. Many are waiting to receive their health insurance refunds. Others, living in medically underserved States, still are not eligible to be reimbursed for basic health services. Hundreds of widows are hoping for changes in the retirement law so that they will be treated more fairly. It is essential that we act as expeditiously as possible to help these individuals and to improve the health insurance and retirement programs.

The President cited two provisions in H.R. 3384 upon which he based his decision to veto the bill. The first was a provision to eliminate the 75-percent cap on Government contributions to the Federal Employees Benefits Program [FEHBP]. The second mandated direct reimbursement for nurses and nurse-midwives for services provided to FEHBP enrollees. I believe the President's objections to these provisions were misdirected. These changes would have resulted in a more equitable health benefits program and substantial long-term savings to the Federal Government. Nevertheless, in order to expedite enactment of this legislation, the bill I am introducing today omits the two provisions specified in the President's veto message.

My colleagues should understand, however, that I will not abandon these two provisions. Earlier in this Congress, conferees on the reconciliation legislation agreed to eliminate the 75-percent ceiling on the Government's FEHBP premium contributions. I continue to support this measure in reconciliation because it will promote long-term cost savings. As enrollees are allowed to take full advantage of the Federal premium contribution, we can expect a shift in enrollments to more efficient health plans, with a corresponding reduction in the Federal Government's overall health insurance premium bill.

It is unfortunate that the Office of Management and Budget [OMB] and the President completely distorted the budgetary impact of the cap provision in vetoing H.R. 3384. Their opposition is especially curious given the administration's long history of support for this reform. The opportunity for another change of heart will present itself again, however, when Congress takes up reconciliation. This issue is far from over.

The President also expressed opposition to a direct reimbursement policy for nurses under the FEHBP. It appears this opposition stems more from political pressure exerted by the American Medical Association than from any inherent problem with the policy, itself. I believe the FEHBP should pay for services provided by nurses and other qualified health professionals. Accordingly, my legislation retains important aspects of this provision.

H.R. 3384, as originally introduced, directed the Office of Personnel Management [OPM] to study the feasibility of direct reimbursement for nonphysician health providers, including nurse practitioners and others. During Senate consideration of H.R. 3384, the study was replaced by mandatory direct reimbursement for nurses and nurse-midwives. The legislation I am introducing today returns to the original study proposal.

My legislation directs the OPM to study and report to Congress, no later than April 1, on the feasibility and cost-effectiveness of direct reimbursement for various health professionals, including nurse practitioners, nurse-midwives, clinical social workers, and chiropractors. Immediately upon completion, the OPM study will be reviewed in hearings before the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits, which I chair, and appropriate legislation will be developed for consideration by this body.

I firmly believe that all qualified health practitioners should be paid for the services they provide. Direct reimbursement not only reflects the value our society places on quality health care, it expands access to providers for our health care consumers. In addition, this reform will promote cost savings. In many cases, nurse practitioners, nurse-midwives, and other professionals can offer the same quality health care for a lower fee than that charged by physicians. We need this kind of cost-effective choice in our Federal Health Insurance Program.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to introduce this legislation to assist Federal employees, annuitants and their dependents. I urge its swift consideration in the House of Representatives so that Federal employees can benefit from these reforms without further delay.

JAMES MATLACK HUGHES

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD notice of the tragic death of Maj. James Matlack Hughes, U.S. Army, and the eulogy delivered by Major Hughes' brother-in-law, Capt. David Gorski, U.S. Army. I want to extend my deepest sympathy to this devoted family.

Major Hughes was born into a distinguished Army family at Fort Benning, GA, on December 9, 1952. As an Army son, Jim Hughes traveled in this country and in Germany with his family. He lived at West Point when his father, Lt. Col. Henry J. Hughes, U.S. Army, was a tactical officer for the Corps of Cadets. Jim Hughes enlisted in the Army in 1970. Then, like his father, Lieutenant Colonel Hughes, and his maternal grandfather, Col. Jesse Brooke Matlack, U.S. Army, Jim Hughes entered the U.S. Military Academy. Jim received a commission in the field artillery upon graduation in 1975. A gifted mathematician, Major Hughes earned a master's degree in applied mathematics at the naval postgraduate school at Annapolis and another in operations research. Major Hughes was awarded the Legion of Merit during his Army service.

Maj. James M. Hughes leaves a valiant family: his wife, Theresa, an Army daughter herself; two children, James Matlack and Heather Holley Hughes; his mother, Barbara Matlack Hughes; his grandmother, Dorothe Kerans Matlack; his twin sister, Brooke Hughes Gorski, nurse and former Army captain; and two brothers, Maj. H. Joseph

Hughes, U.S. Army, and Capt. John M. Hughes, U.S. Army.

Capt. David Gorski, an Army doctor in San Antonio, TX, delivered the eulogy of Maj. James Matlack Hughes, just as that splendid soldier had done for his father in 1981. Major Hughes told that bereft gathering that he wanted to be like his father and endeavored to emulate that noble man since his childhood in Germany.

JAMES MATLACK HUGHES, 1952-1985

"To remember him is to recall a happy man who loved life, with a twinkle in his eye, a quick smile, a man who loved people, and was easy to love in return."

These words were written by Jim Hughes. They were spoken from this very pulpit four years ago as Jim delivered his father's eulogy. There is a twinge of irony in the thought that Jim could easily have been writing about himself, and yet the words are so fitting: "a man who loved all of us, and who was so easy to love in return."

I think it is especially tragic when a young man dies. Somehow the loss seems so much more profound. We are left shocked and bewildered, even questioning our very purpose in life. In Jim's mind there would be no doubt as to his purpose on earth. He would tell you he was here to be a soldier. Like his father and his mother's father, Jim graduated from West Point, where the tenants of the Academy's motto, Duty, Honor, Country, were more than words emblazened on a school ring. For Jim, the motto was a template for his actions. He was a man of traditional values: loyalty, truthfulness, totally dedicated to his profession. A soldier's soldier, his great military love was to push troops, and he would have been content to be in command his entire career. In Jim's mind, this was his purpose.

But I would disagree. Jim Hughes was here to touch all of us. He was a compassionate, caring man with a great talent for making you feel good about yourself. I remember meeting him for the first time. I was newly assigned to the headquarters of the Field Artillery School, trying to keep a low profile. Jim was the general's aide working down the hall. Now Jim and I had gone to the same high school, but had never met; for he was only a freshman when I was a senior. On my second afternoon in the job, Jim marched into my office, straight to my desk and said, "Sir, I know you! You're Dave Gorski!" Then in front of me and my new co-workers he began to recite with freshman admiration all of my high school achievements, half of them embellished and the other half purely fabricated. By the time he finished I was sure to be canonized. I feigned embarrassment, but secretly I was delighted. And this was so typical of Jim. He was far more interested in the achievements of his family and friends than in his own many accomplishments.

Telling you this story reminds me what a marvelous storyteller Jim was. His anecdotes were wonderful. With his articulate and expressive style, he could make you feel as if you had been right there. And his laugh was infectious. Those of you who knew him can hear it now—a deep raucous boistrous belly laugh, that turned his ruddy cheeks redder, and warmed all of us.

It is memories like these that serve as Jim's legacy. The importance of his life is the impact he had on all of us. He touched us with his goodness and his generosity. His memory inspires us to care a little more, to give a bit more, as Jim gave so freely of himself. Truly, there was never a more devoted husband or loving father, never a more dutiful son or brother. There was no better friend. To remember him is to recall a happy man who loved life, the twinkle in his eye, the quick smile, a man who loved all of us, and who was so easy to love in return. We will miss him dearly. Godspeed, Jim!

ANDREI SAKHAROV

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 21, 1986

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of Dr. Andrei Sakharov, prominent nuclear physicist, human rights activist, and Nobel Peace Prize recipient, currently residing, in exile, in the closed city of Gorky. January 22, marks the sixth anniversary of the date on which Dr. Sakharov was arrested and exiled. According to Soviet law, 5 years is the maximum someone may be internally exiled. In addition, Dr. Sakharov was never convicted of an actual crime.

This 64-year-old peace activist is in poor physical health. He has been harassed, treated with mind-altering drugs, and is disallowed access to facilities and information neccessary to continue his work. Dr. Sakharov is not allowed to communicate with foreigners and, at times, his own family. As of this date he has not been heard from in over 3 weeks.

Dr. Sakharov's wife, Yelena Bonner, now recovering from surgery in Boston, is also restricted to residency in Gorky. This 62-year-old victim of Soviet antisemitism was only recently given permission to come to the United States for critically needed surgery. Permission to come was given only after repeated and extensive hunger strikes by Dr. Sakharov, and Western pleas on her behalf.

The Helsinki Act, cosigned by the Soviets, is supposed to guarantee the fundamental rights of people like the Sakharovs. As we know, all too well, this has not been the case in the Soviet Union.

Only through continuous petitioning and condemnation of the Soviet's violation of human rights, demonstrating our sincere concern, can we hope to force the leaders of that nation to see the error of their ways. Their constant violation of their citizen's rights, guaranteed them as human beings, cannot be allowed to continue without consequence. The Soviet Union must realize the rights of the people they claim to represent, and the effect such actions will have on the relations between the West and the U.S.S.R.

WHY NOT A TEST BAN?

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration should adopt the offer made by the Soviet Union, and abandon its opposition to a test ban. A comprehensive test ban would make great strides toward stopping the arms race, while seriously inhibiting nuclear proliferation.

I would like to call my colleagues attention to an excellent article by Flora Lewis which appeared in the New York Times on Friday, January 24. The article is a superb commentary on the need for a test ban, and the rationale behind the anti-test-ban position. Mrs. Lewis indicates that Congress should press for a comprehensive test ban, and I wholeheartedly agree.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 24, 1986]

WHY NOT A TEST BAN?

(By Flora Lewis)

GENEVA.—Mikhail Gorbachev has extended the Soviet moratorium on nuclear testing until the end of March to induce the United States to stop testing. A House resolution calling on the Administration to resume negotiations for a complete nuclear test ban has 207 Congressional co-sponsors, and is sure of passage. A similar resolution was passed by the Senate.

Since 1963, the U.S. has repeatedly committed itself by treaty to negotiate a permanent ban on all nuclear tests. But the Reagan Administration has broken off talks with Moscow on the issue and clearly does not want to start up again. It is apparently all the more reluctant now, since the Russians have made interesting offers for inspection and verification, rather than being intrigued by this new Soviet flexibility on what was always called the major stumbling block.

Why? There are layers on layers in the arguments against giving up nuclear explosions underground, the only remaining legal possibility. A current favorite is to develop the X-ray laser weapon for "Star Wars," which has to be fueled by a nuclear explosion. Beyond that is the argument that the U.S. can't rely on its existing arsenal without testing some other weapons occasionally to see if they still work as planned.

The anti-test-ban group in the Pentagon, at the weapons laboratories and elsewhere brushes aside the point that the Russians would be faced with the same uncertainty about their weapons, which would make them less likely to try a surprise attack. They say the less sophisticated Soviet arms are more "robust," a word fashionable in military jargon, and therefore less likely to deteriorate than more complex, refined American missiles.

And why aren't American missiles made so they are more reliable and can have defective parts replaced without nuclear tests? They could be, but as the Livermore physicist Hugh E. DeWitt pointed out in 1983 in the magazine Physics Today, the labs don't want to design them that way. The designers have always worked on the assumption that tests will never be forbidden, and therefore they can argue that they need tests to ratify their choice of design. It makes a closed circle.

If tests were banned, the lab directors say, the designers would drift off to other jobs in boredom and frustration. The United States would lose its pool of expertise. Is the real reason for continued testing then to give weapons designers something exciting to do?

No, say the opponents of a ban, it's because the Russians might cheat no matter how effective the verification system, and then America would need experienced people to catch up quickly.

Besides, some argue, if the U.S. wants to move away from multi-warhead missiles, which are destabilizing and vulnerable, toward smaller, one-warhead missiles like Midgetman, it could need more tests. But this isn't at all clear. Donald Kerr, who recently resigned as director of the research installation at Los Alamos, N.M., has said that whether tests would be required depends on Pentagon specifications for the missiles. The Pentagon has deliberately dawdled in deciding what it wants, and doesn't seem to want Midgetman.

As you probe down and down through the arguments, the basic one emerges. It is that the United States needs to keep "all its options," that it needs to have the choice to make different and better nuclear weapons when a new idea comes along.

And that leads to the core question. Even as it negotiates with Moscow to destroy a large percentage of existing weapons on both sides, does America still want to keep building more kinds of nuclear arms, or are there more than enough in the world already?

While a comprehensive test ban wouldn't guarantee that no more countries are going to become avowed nuclear powers, it would be a strong restraint on proliferation. If the Soviet Union, the U.S. and Britain, which were negotiating such a ban, agreed to renounce all testing permanently, any test by a new country would provoke world outrage and possibly sanctions.

There are compelling reasons for a ban that can be adequately verified, it would go a long way toward stopping the nuclear arms race. But it is obvious that the Administration refuses to take the initiative. So it is up to Congress.

Congress has proved that it can act effectively on arms control by making a law banning U.S. tests of antisatellite weapons as long as the Russians don't test them. That is an important start. The next step is to press for a ban on all nuclear tests.

THE HISTORY OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

HON. CHARLES McC. MATHIAS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, during the last quarter of a century many Members of the Congress have participated in sessions of the North Atlantic Assembly. Some have served as officers of the Assembly and as chairmen of Assembly committees. But today few Members have any personal recollection of the days when the concept of a parliamentary group within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was first discussed and developed.

It is useful to refresh our memory in this respect. As we consider the future agenda of the North Atlantic Assembly there is value in reviewing the purpose in the minds of the founders of the Assembly and the goals that they sought. One important element in setting our course for the future is to be very familiar with the road over which we have come.

An interesting paper entitled "Evolution of an Atlantic Assembly" by John A. Matthews was recently brought to my attention by former Representative Henry P. Smith III. It is dated January 20, 1962, so we can read it today with all the wisdom of hindsight. But we can also use it as a benchmark to determine how well we have employed an important institution. I ask that this paper be printed in the RECORD.

The paper follows:

EVOLUTION OF AN ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

(By John A. Mathews)

INTRODUCTION

Interparliamentary assemblies have been made a substantial component of wholly-European political structures which have been created since World War II in the general social movement toward unity of "Western" countries. Such assemblies are now an important component of the Council of Europe, the Western European Union, and the three "European Communities"—Coal and Steel, Atomic Energy and Economic. Only the "Atlantic" structures—the Organization for economic Cooperation and Development and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization—and the decaying European Free Trade Association—have failed to make use of an interparliamentary assembly. However, the value of such an assembly to the more extensive Atlantic structures has not gone unnoticed but has been proposed and promoted privately to a point where it may soon gain acceptance by the cooperating governments. It is the purpose of this paper to trace the evolution of this historic development.

ORIGIN AND BACKGROUND OF THE PROPOSAL FOR AN ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

The first widely-publicized proposal for an Atlantic Assembly was made by Senator Guy M. Gillette in a speech at Charlotte, North Carolina, on November 20, 1951. He said:

"What a great advance it would be if the legislators who are elected by and responsible to the peoples of the North Atlantic could meet regularly in a continuing forum to cooperate on solving common Atlantic problems!

"Why should we not set up; machinery through which the legislators of the Western European and British parliaments, the parliament of Canada, and the U.S. Congress could come together to consider common problems in the framework in which those problems really fit? Why should there not be created a North Atlantic Assembly?"

This proposal, made at the very moment that a delegation from the United States Congress was conferring with a delegation of the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe, aroused interest in the United States, Canada, and Western Europe. That meeting had been arranged by Mr. Spaak and Lord Layton, President and Vice-President of the Consultative Assembly in compliance with a resolution of that Assembly several months before. They had visited the United States, presented the Resolution to the Speakers of both Houses of Congress together with a synopsis of the Assembly's structure, role, and record, and had developed an agenda for such a meeting.

The Resolution had been proposed to the Assembly by Mr. Paul Reynaud, who in a speech at a World Brotherhood dinner in Washington in March 1951 had suggested that members of the U.S. Congress belonging to both parties come to the September meeting of the Assembly of the Council of Europe to discuss the "vital interests which bind us together . . ."

Senator Gillette's proposal probably culminated from numerous favorable responses he had received from legislators and political leaders of the North Atlantic countries to a letter he had sent in February 1951 "urging them to press for a governmental union of the democracies now associated in the Atlantic Alliance." In this letter, which had been sent with the concurrence of 26 others, he also described an informal committee being formed in the U.S. Congress to advance this cause, and suggested that similar groups be formed within the Parliamentary body of each of the Atlantic-Pact-sponsoring countries.

Concurrently with the Gillette proposal, Freedom & Union magazine published an article proposing a North Atlantic Assembly as an organ of NATO. Written by Mr. Livingston Hartley, a dedicated student of Atlantic unity, this article argued that "unity cannot be forged by governments alone; there must be a desire for unity and a feeling of unity among people or else their representatives in Congress and in parliaments will balk at steps which the common welfare requires." It also proposed several ways by which such an assembly could be created.

What was the background of these proposals for an Atlantic Assembly? It is probable that an assembly was considered and rejected by the drafters of the North Atlantic Treaty in 1948, so what encouraged Senator Gillette and Mr. Hartley to make their proposals in November 1951? The most obvious encouragement was the booming success of the program of the Atlantic Union Committee which had been formed about two years before for the purpose of:

"(a) enlisting public support for a resolution to be introduced in Congress inviting the other democracies with whom the U.S. is contemplating an alliance, to meet with American delegates in a federal convention to explore the possibilities of uniting with them in a Federal Union of the Free, and

"(b) continuing this support until such a Federal Union of Democracies becomes an accomplished fact."

Led by Owen J. Roberts, a former Associate Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, Judge Robert P. Patterson, a former Secretary. of War, and William L. Clayton, a former Undersecretary of State, this Committee had secured the introduction into both Houses of Congress (July 1949) of a resolution "inviting the democracies which sponsored the North Atlantic Treaty to name delegates to a Federal Convention." Their personal influence and that of thousands of citizens who had joined the Committee in the two years since, had secured the publicly-declared support of almost a third of the Senate and over a fourth of the House. A brochure of the Atlantic Union Committee including the text of the Resolution is attached as Appendix A. Senator Gillette had been one of the original sponsors of the Resolution and had become an enthusiastic advocate of it. Mr. Hartley had been a governor of the Atlantic Union Committee almost from its inception and had been devoting all of his time to promoting its purposes.

It is not the purpose of this study to discover the individual inspiration of the Atlantic assembly concept but the foregoing discussion would be superficial without some explanation of the origin of the Atlantic Union Committee. This Committee was an offspring of another private citizen's movement, Federal Union, Incorporated, which had been struggling for ten years to spread the concept of a federation of free people to form a nucleus for eventual world federation. Its founder, Clarence Streit, was a reporter for the New York Times. As its representative in Geneva about eight years before that, he had witnessed the decline of the League of Nations and gotten the inspiration for his book "Union Now" which many widely-revered persons acclaimed as an epoch-making proposal.

Incorporated as a non-profit educational membership association in 1940, its roots were local committees of little-known persons in communities from Boston to Oakland, California. These had met in July 1939 and organized the Inter-Democracy Federal Unionists, which a year later became Federal Union, Incorporated.

The need for direct political action was gradually recognized in the years immediately following World War II. The impact of the atomic explosions and the creation of the United Nations had evidently convinced many Federal Union members that they should begin to crusade for a universal federation without the intermediate phase of interdemocracy federation. Federal Union rapidly shrunk in size but its leaders retained faith in the practicality of its purpose. In 1946, it began publication of a monthly magazine, Freedom & Union, which has been very influential in promoting the "union of democracies" concept.

In January 1949 Justice Roberts at the suggestion of Mr. Streit, Senator Kefauver and several others, invited a group of about seventy to form the Atlantic Union Committee of which he became and remained the president until his death in May 1955.

The above "flashbacks" thus reveal that the proposal for an Atlantic Assembly stemmed from a more fundamental proposal to create a comprehensive government of democratic nations—most of which have gradually come to be thought of as the Atlantic Community.

POLITICAL ENVIRONMENT OF THE PROPOSAL

When the Assembly proposal was made, the Council of Europe had been in operation more than two years. Its Consultative Assembly had shown considerable vitality and a profundity to overcome the habits of nationalism. Negotiations for the Coal and Steel Community had been completed and it was awaiting ratification. It would have an Assembly with power to review the performance of the executive and dismiss it if unsatisfactory. The European Defense Community had been proposed a year before. It would have an assembly with similar power.

The Gillette and Hartley proposals for an Atlantic Assembly were soon supplemented by group action in widely distant places. In the Netherlands, two groups—the Association for the International Rule of Law, and the Netherlands Council of the European Movement—issued in March 1952 a joint resolution as a basis for action toward a North Atlantic federation, and established a committee to further their cooperation in this. The first paragraph of the Resolution advocated "A North Atlantic representative assembly within the framework of NATO. Even if this assembly could not make binding decisions, as a representative body it might have a great deal of influence in molding opinion.

About a month later, sixty Canadian senators and members of Parliament were hosts to a U.S. delegation comprising Justice Roberts, Senator Gillette, and Congressman Leroy Johnson. Other top officials of the Atlantic Union Committee accompanied the Delegation.

After two full sessions of debate, the joint group unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Therefore be it resolved that, as a first step, this Conference urges the national legislatures of the sponsor nations of NATO to give consideration to the creation of a North Atlantic Assembly, composed of parliamentary representatives of the people concerned, which will have as its objective the implementation of Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty.

Only two days before, on a motion of Alistair Stewart, Member of Parliament for Winnipeg North, the Canadian parliament had debated the Atlantic Union Resolution and adopted the following policy:

"That, in the opinion of this house, if an invitation is received by the parliament of Canada to appoint delegates to meet with delegates from the legislatures of the sponsor nations of NATO, with a view to discussing their closer cooperation within the framework of the United Nations Organization, the Government should give consideration to the acceptance of the invitation."

In the same week on a motion of John Tilney, a Conservative Member of Parliament from Liverpool, the British House of Commons declared itself in favor of using " . . . every endeavor to bring about a closer partnership, economically and politically, among the North Atlantic Treaty Powers and any other nation which practices the concepts and ideals of Western civilization."

Several weeks later (May 1952), the Atlantic Union Committee held a "strategy conference" in Washington and, at the request of General Draper, the U.S. Permanent Representative on the North Atlantic Treaty Council in Paris, cabled its views to him. The first recommendation was "a North Atlantic Assembly composed of representatives of the peoples of NATO whose objective would be to implement Article II of the Treaty." The European Defense Community Treaty was signed in May and the Coal and Steel Community was ratified two months later.

In a report to President Truman the following August Mr. Draper said, "In the free world the trend toward unity and strength is now clear. If this trend can be maintained, we can see ahead the changes in world relations for which free men everywhere have waited since Soviet imperialism unmasked its evil intentions."

By then (August 1952), Atlantic Union groups had been formed in five of the seven countries which founded NATO: the United States, Canada, France, Netherlands and Great Britain.

In the U.S. election only a few months away, voters were confronted with Atlantic Union supporters on both tickets. Both nominees for vice-president—Senators Nixon and Sparkman—had co-sponsored the Atlantic Union Resolution. Senator Kefauver, its chief sponsor, had been a leading candidate for the presidential nominee on the first two ballots of the Democratic Convention.

In September 1952, three events improved the environment for Atlantic unity. First was the 41st session of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. Several hundred parliamentarians of thirty-five countries adopted a resolution recommending that each national delegation work for the adaptation of its own constitutional laws to render international collaboration more effective. Senator Kefauver, member of the U.S. Delegation, praised the progress being made toward federation in Western Europe but stressed that the most important effort for federation is the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Second was a conference of nearly a hundred influential individuals from fourteen of the NATO countries in Oxford, England. They met to consider how to promote among the people of these countries a fuller understanding of the implications of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Sponsored by the British Society for International Understanding, this meeting was addressed by Lord Ismay, the first Secretary-General of NATO, and had been inspired by his influence on the Society about six months earlier. This was the beginning of the first international movement to promote Atlantic unity. Third was the biennial meeting of the British Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in Ottawa. Among the ninety-five delegates representing forty-seven legislatures were several from Ireland and the United States. At its previous meeting it had adopted a new object reading:

"To promote understanding and cooperation through the exchange of information and visits between its members and the members of legislatures which are not part of the British Commonwealth, but which share with it common parliamentary practice or tradition, common language and interests, or past political relations."

While the first draft of a European constitution was being prepared by the Ad Hoc Assembly created for this purpose by the Council of the European Coal and Steel Community, Mr. Edward Herriot, President of the French National Assembly, and Mr. Gaston Monerville, President of the Council of the French Republic, joined the French Atlantic Union Committee.

Writing in Look magazine in November 1952, Arnold Toynbee said:

"In Western countries whose constitutions are federal as well as democratic, it is an axiom that a political unity at the governmental level will remain precarious, and perhaps illusory, unless and until it has been underpinned by unity at the deeper level of popular representative institutions. If we were now to take this first step of convening delegations of national legislatures from all the NATO countries to deal, at this level, with NATO's common affairs, we might find that we had created a growing point from which a democratically governed Western community could bring itself into being step by step."

In the meanwhile, Mr. Hartley, an originator of the Atlantic assembly proposal, continued to keep it current by timely articles in Freedom & Union. See "Four Trends Knitting the Atlantic Community", Nov. 1952, and "A North Atlantic Assembly" in January and February 1953. The latter is a research report comprehensively dealing with the purpose, functions, and structure of such an assembly.

The Dutch Atlantic Committee, now a year old, sponsored a conference at the Hague in March 1953 which achieved two important results:

"(1) It expressed and was itself the proof that the pursuit of European Union and Atlantic Union was compatible and could be undertaken simultaneously;

"(2) It resulted in the first authoritatively formulated request to be made in Europe for giving the people—not simply the governments—representation in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization."

As the Council of NATO was about to meet in Paris in April 1953, one hundred and forty prominent citizens of Britain, Canada, France and the United States addressed an open letter to their countrymen and NATO representatives. It called attention to the "authority in the Treaty for further development of the North Atlantic Community" and suggested among other things:

"The creation of a North Atlantic Consultative Assembly, composed of representatives of peoples of the NATO countries, which would have as its principal objective the implementation of Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty which pledges members to bring about "conditions of stability and well being" and to "encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them."

This letter had been initiated by Governor Christian Herter of Massachusetts; Joseph C. Crew, former Ambassador to Japan; former Undersecretary of State, Will L. Clayton, Texas; and former Ambassador to Norway, Lithgow Osborne. Among its signers were numerous leaders in the fields of industry, education, religion, labor, publishing, finance, science, law, civic organizations and public affairs. This proved to be the impetus for a similar but more important later enterprise. (see p. 14)

Reporting on the meeting of the NATO Council, Pierre Streit of the Paris Bureau of Freedom & Union, noted:

"That proposals are now reportedly being considered by the NATO international staff to create something very similar to a consultative body. The proposal is that each member Parliament appoint a special committee on NATO affairs and that these committees meet together in Paris from time to time to thrash out problems of common concern.

His report is supported by later information that the Norwegian Storting (parliament) had discussed such a proposal and its NATO representative had placed it on the agenda of the North Atlantic Council which had referred it to a working committee.

The international movement started by the British Society for International Understanding in September 1952 held a "Second Atlantic Community Conference" at Copenhagen in Sept. 1953. One hundred and twenty persons from all fourteen NATO countries studied the progress of private national organizations "working to enlighten public opinion on the Atlantic community" in several member countries, and made plans to "hasten the creation of Atlantic Committees in member nations where they do not exist and set August 1954 as a deadline for drafting a constitution for a permanent International Atlantic Organization" (of all these private national organizations). It did not adopt but noted a resolution of one of its commissions which:

"Recommends to the North Atlantic Council and its Member Governments that they consider favorably the creation within the framework of NATO of a conference, advisory in nature, representative of the Parliaments of Member Nations which would meet periodically to discuss common problems concerning the development of the Atlantic Community, in particular those relating to the implementation of Article II of the Treaty."

A similar resolution had been rejected the year before. A year later, this became the Atlantic Treaty Association with affiliates in most NATO countries.

Senator Kefauver placed the Atlantic Assembly in a historical frame of reference in addressing the 42d session of the Interparliamentary Union. One of the main topics for this session held in the United States Capitol in October 1953 was "Parliaments and Foreign Affairs." His comprehensive discourse on the history and nature of various parliaments ended with an endorsement of the proposals of the Norwegian parliament and the Copenhagen Conference that NATO create "an advisory body drawn from the parliaments of the member nations."

Dennis Healy, a member of the British House of Commons, who had supported Senator Kefauver's endorsement at the Interparliamentary Union meeting, put it before the House of Commons the following December (1953) during debate on foreign affairs. The Economist of London reported Mr. Healy's action and published a long editorial on the ramifications of giving NATO a consultative assembly.

THE NATO PARLIAMENTARIANS

Although Senator Gillette had mentioned an informal committee of U.S. legislators early in 1951—in connection with his letters to legislators and political leaders of North Atlantic countries urging them to do likewise, the first formally-constituted group of legislators for this purpose was formed in Canada in May 1954. This group included fifty members of both Houses and of all four major parties; it was led by Senator Wishart Robertson, Speaker of the Senate, including John Diefenbaker, then spokesman on External Affairs for the main opposition party in the House of Commons (now Prime Minister), and the chairman for External Affairs of both Houses. Its objectives were:

1. To develop among its members a greater knowledge of the accomplishments of NATO, and to consider in what manner, while maintaining adequate common self-defense, it may be further developed as an instrument in assisting to achieve for the peoples of the signatory countries, and incidentally for all men of good will, the greatest possible degree of freedom, economic betterment and political stability.

2. To make and maintain contact with parliamentary representatives in other NATO countries who have similar purposes, and to seek to meet periodically with all such representatives for joint public discussions of common problems and aims.

Senator Robertson then wrote to the Speakers of the legislative assemblies in all the other NATO countries inviting them to form similar associations to cooperate with Canada's.

In August 1954, ratification of the European Defense Community failed, and the proposed European Political Community was abandoned. However, the Brussels Treaty was then quickly converted into the Western European Union.

By October 1954, the "open letter" mentioned above (see page 12) had developed into what has since been known as the Declaration of Atlantic Unity. One hundred and sixty-nine leaders in many fields from eight of the NATO countries had signed the Declaration and it had been released to the press of these countries on the same day as the Nine Power Accords in London. Soon thereafter, the number of signatures increased to 244 "distinguished citizens of many occupations . . . including members of nearly all the political parties of . . . nine countries." (Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Italy, Netherlands, Norway, United Kingdom and United States). All nine foreign ministers, the heads of five governments, other party leaders, and the civilian and military chiefs of NATO commented favorably on it.

At a dinner in New York in November 1954, a group including the Speakers of the Canadian Senate and the Belgian Chamber of Representatives, the Foreign Affairs Chairman of the Norwegian Storting, a former Defense Minister of France and members of four other NATO legislatures decided to promote the formation of NATO Parliamentary Associations in each of their legislatures and the sending of delegates to a conference of legislators from NATO countries at Paris in July 1955.

On December 16, 1954, a distinguished delegation headed by Roy H. Thomson, leading Canadian newspaper publisher, and representing the eight countries then participating, presented the Declaration formally to the North Atlantic Council in Paris. The delegation was entertained at lunch, together with the President of the Council and the Permanent Representatives of the eight countries, by Lord Ismay. Addressing the delegation and the press, Lord Ismay said: "I will send copies to all the governments and the Council in permanent session will continue, we hope, with even added vigor to try to carry out those clauses (points 2, 3 and 4) of the Declaration.

The Declaration with a list of the signatories, the comments of government leaders, the text of the North Atlantic Treaty, a summary of the Paris Agreements which modified the Brussels Treaty, and a brief description of eleven organizations promoting Atlantic union or unity was published early in 1955 in English and French and sent to all members of the sponsors' national legislatures.

Those endeavors succeeded and a NATO Parliamentary body was created in Paris at the Palais de Chaillot July 18-22, 1955. It comprised 190 legislators from all the NATO countries, and although many were outstanding leaders with long experience in Atlantic Affairs, only six of them—all from the House—represented the United States. Several U.S. Senators had signed the Declaration but it proved impossible to send a delegation from the Senate. This first assembly of parliamentarians of NATO countries apparently considered it wise to make no pronouncements of substance but simply to provide for regular meetings arranged through the North Atlantic Council. It adopted a resolution to this effect and established a Continuing Committee to implement it.

This Committee met several times and prepared comprehensive plans for the second assembly. Its U.S. Member, Congressman Wayne Hays introduced timely legislation which assured continuing and appropriate representation of the United States.

The Second NATO Parliamentary Conference met at the Palais de Chaillot from November 19-22, 1956 but, unlike the first, had a carefully prepared agenda, considered proposals prepared by experts, and adopted several important resolutions. Meeting in the midst of the Suez-Hungary crisis served as a special test of its usefulness. Of the 175 delegates from all NATO legislatures, seventeen were from the United States and included the Majority Leader of the Senate, prospective chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. Evidently in appreciation of his devotion to the cause, Congressman Wayne Hays was elected president. Canadian Senator Robertson, the founder and first president, was named Honorary President. He was unable to attend but sent a long letter expressing his views concerning the auspices and functions of the assembly. Resolutions adopted concerned the Soviet use of force against Hungary, political and military consultation on developments outside the NATO area, training of scientific and technical personnel, oil supply, aid to underdeveloped countries, cultural progress, future status of the Conference, and possibility of financing future conferences from NATO funds. Among those attending were: Senator Johnson (now U.S. Vice President), Hugh Gaitskell (leader of the Opposition in United Kingdom), Senator Michel Debré (now Premier of France) and Lord Ismay, Secretary-General of NATO.

The third meeting of the Parliamentarians at the same place in November 1957 reveals signs of a mature and durable institution. Permanent rules of procedure were adopted including a system of voting not requiring unanimity and giving voting power to countries on a basis approximating their populations. Committees were established to deal with cultural, economic and political matters—and each had for consideration proposals prepared by rapporteurs selected at the previous conference. Addresses by the Secretary General of NATO and three outstanding military leaders were each followed by a searching question and answer period. Resolutions adopted were more significant than before and the meeting was given much better coverage by the Press. The Conference of 160 legislators from twelve NATO countries unanimously adopted resolutions:

(1) initiating two steps towards greater Atlantic unity on the citizen level: the first instructing its Standing and Political Committees to arrange a meeting of leading citizens "whose cooperation would be valuable and appropriate for the convening in 1959 . . . of an Atlantic Congress comparable to the Hague Congress of 1948" and requesting the heads of governments to support this proposal at their next meeting; the second recommending that the NATO governments, in consultation with these two committees, bring about a conference composed of leading representative citizens to convene as often as necessary to examine exhaustively and to recommend how greater cooperation and unity of purpose, as envisioned by the North Atlantic Treaty, may best be developed. This resolution proposed that "the members of the Conference should, as far as possible, be officially appointed but should act in accordance with their individual convictions." Findings and recommendations would be reported to the appropriate committees of the NATO Parliamentarians' Conference as well as to governments and the North Atlantic Council.

(2) suggesting that a link be set up between the Standing Committee and the North Atlantic Council, that the NATO Secretariat prepare a report each year for discussion by the Conference, and that the NATO Council delegate one of its members to be present.

(3) urging improved consultation and implementation of Article II of the Treaty.

(4) to submit to the North Atlantic Council and urge it to bring to the attention of the forthcoming heads-of-government meeting, a Conference report proposing talent development scholarships, mathematical science awards, summer institutes, cooperative project research under NATO contract, A NATO Defense Missile Training Center and an Atlantic Institute for Defense Studies.

(5) proposing a "coordinated Atlantic policy to serve as the basis for a common system of defense" as well as steps to improve defense, including close collaboration between NATO political and military leadership and how to apply the NATO infrastructure program elsewhere.

(6) requesting the Standing Committee to study during the coming year the proposals for an Atlantic Institute made by the Bruges Conference on North Atlantic Community in September and, if desirable, cooperate with groups seeking this objective.

(7) recommending that the NATO Secretary General produce a publication which would give an account of the achievements, the power and the possibilities of NATO and of the Atlantic Community.

(8) urging further assistance by NATO members to bodies dealing with refugees from Communist enslavement.

(9) recommending specific steps to bring about consideration of economic affairs of member countries, aid to under-developed areas and foreign economic and technical assistance and private investment which might be coordinated within the NATO framework.

(10) adopting an annual budget of 40,000 pounds, ($112,000) to enable the new work envisioned in these resolutions to be undertaken.

At this the third meeting of the Parliamentarians there was considerable evidence of "a growing spirit of teamwork among the Atlantic legislators."

SOME EFFECTS OF THE PARLIAMENTARIANS

The NATO Parliamentarians have continued to meet annually and to expand their influence but further references to these meetings will be made only as related to three actions of this Assembly which seem to have a great portent for the future.

A. The Atlantic Congress

The first step in the first resolution adopted by the third NATO Parliamentarians Conference came to fruition in London in June 1959. As instructed by the Conference, its Standing and Political Committees proceeded to arrange for an Atlantic Congress comparable to the Congress of Europe held at The Hague in 1948. The latter had adopted resolutions proposing the merging of some aspects of sovereignty preparatory to the creation of an economic and political union, the establishment of a European consultative assembly and a court of human rights. It was a major impetus to the establishment of the Council of Europe.

Special non-governmental national committees selected about 650 eminent citizens from their countries—former prime ministers, foreign ministers, legislators, ambassadors, generals, corporation and labor union executives, college presidents, religious leaders, editors, authors and persons from other fields of endeavor. The number from each nation was approximately proportioned to the respective populations.

These met for six days, June 5-10, in London to consider the theme: "The Atlantic Community in the Next Ten Years." This Atlantic Congress was opened by Queen Elizabeth and addressed by Prime Minister Macmillan, Opposition Leader Hugh Gaitskell, and the Archbishop of York from Britain; Prince Bernhard, Foreign Minister Luns and Colonel J. J. Fens, President of the NATO Parliamentarians Association and of the Congress, from the Netherlands; NATO Secretary General Spaak, former Premier Van Zeeland and J. Oldenbrock, General Secretary of the World Federation of Free Trade Unions, from Belgium; J. F. Cahan, Deputy Secretary General of OEEC, from Canada; Foreign Minister Lange of Norway; and General Lauris Norstad, NATO Commander-in-Chief, Admiral Jerauld Wright, Supreme Allied Atlantic Naval Commander, Lewis Douglas, former Ambassador to Britain, Eric Johnston, former President U.S. Chamber of Commerce, and Dr. Mordecai Johnson, president of Howard University, from the United States.

The Congress established five committees to consider various kinds of problems:

A. Spiritual and Cultural.
B. Political.
C. Economic.
D. Free World.
E. Communist Bloc.

The Congress adopted many of the resolutions emanating from these Committees and also consolidated them into a declaration which is quoted below:

"DECLARATION OF THE ATLANTIC CONGRESS, 1959

"I. PRINCIPLES

"Six major principles have guided this Congress.

"A-1. The NATO military alliance has, in its first ten years, preserved the peace of Europe, although the threat of aggression is still present.

"A-2. Great changes have taken place in this decade that make essential increased cooperation among Atlantic nations in all fields.

"A-3. No military alliance can endure unless supported by close political and economic cooperation.

"A-4. The time is ripe for these nations to build an Atlantic community with responsibilities extending to military, political, economic, social and scientific fields.

"B-5. The Atlantic nations are interdependent with the other nations of the free world. All these nations want peace and the preservation of their own conception of life. All have a common interest in the development of economic activity and social improvement throughout the world; all people have a common stake and status in a free world.

"B-6. The Atlantic community has a duty to help less developed countries to help themselves.

"II. PROPOSALS

"In order to apply these principles, the Congress has passed a number of important resolutions, attention being drawn particularly to the following:

"A. Political

"1. That there should be increased consultation and cooperation among member states. Consultation should become a habit, not an occasional exercise.

"2. That there should be broader and more frequent consultation among Parliamentarians of the Atlantic countries, and that the governments should convene a special conference of leading citizens to examine exhaustively means of attaining greater unity, as recommended by the third NATO Parliamentarians' Conference.

"3. That national governments should not take major decisions affecting NATO unity without previous consultation.

"4. That the report of the "Three Wise Men" should be more fully implemented.

"B. Military

"1. That the forces forming the European shield should be brought as soon as possible up to the minimum strength laid down in the agreed strategic concept of NATO.

"2. That governments should give continual attention to improving the military structure of NATO, and in particular should foster increasing interdependence throughout the military field.

"C. Economic

"1. That governments should promote the maximum economic growth in production, employment and living standards and should avoid restrictive economic measures, take all feasible actions to reduce tariff barriers and maintain monetary stability; and, in view of the services rendered by OEEC and EEC and those one might expect from any other form of effective multilateral association, they should work especially for an increase of the benefits of closer economic integration.

"2. That consideration be given to the possibility of transforming OEEC into an OAEC in which all Atlantic countries would hold full membership.

"3. That the Atlantic countries should undertake a massive and sustained effort to help the peoples of the less developed countries to achieve a rising standard of living together with individual freedom, human dignity and democratic institutions; in this effort we must act not as outside patrons but as equal partners with them in a joint enterprise of freedom.

"D. Cultural

"1. That effective counter measures be taken by NATO countries to combat Soviet ideological warfare and that there be set up an international unofficial free nations organization for the dissemination of information to this end.

"2. That a 'Studies Centre for the Atlantic Community' be set up, to serve as a clearing house and intellectual focus.

"3. That there should be further integration of scientific research and in particular of pure research.

"4. That informational and educational activities should be strengthened and broadened in order to bring the significance of the Atlantic Community with its spiritual and moral content more deeply into the hearts and minds of the peoples of the world."

The greatest significance of this Declaration is perhaps the fact that all three of its proposals for the establishment or further development of institutions have been implemented. The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development which began last September fulfilled proposal C 2; the Atlantic Institute recently established in Paris fulfilled proposal D 2; and the Atlantic Convention which began in Paris several weeks ago fulfilled proposal A 2.

B. The Atlantic Institute

In September 1957—two months before the third conference of the NATO Parliamentarians, another Conference on North Atlantic Community was held at Bruges, Belgium. The University of Pennsylvania and the College of Europe had collaborated to assemble more than a hundred scholars, journalists, and other intellectuals from nineteen countries to study the spiritual and cultural aspects of Atlantic community. Its most concrete recommendation called for the establishment of an Atlantic Institute to develop a sense of community among the Atlantic peoples and all others who share their basic ideals. It was to be governed by a board of eminent citizens and so constituted as to be able to receive funds from foundations, individuals, institutions and governments in order to provide research and coordination of related endeavors.

Among the distinguished participants and observers were former French Premier Robert Schuman; British Member of Parliament Walter Elliott, treasurer of the NATO Parliamentarians; Thomas K. Finletter (now U.S. Ambassador to NATO); General Pierre Billotte, former French Minister of Defense; Marcel Decombis, director of the European School of the Coal and Steel Community; Hans R. Nord, Chairman, Netherlands Atlantic Committee; James Reston, Washington correspondent for the New York Times; Jacques Rueff, Judge, Court of Justice, Coal and Steel Community; and former Belgian Premier Paul Van Zeeland. The Institute was promptly endorsed by the Parliamentarians (see page 20) and later (1959) given a greater boost by the Atlantic Congress which had been initiated by the Parliamentarians.

A nucleus for such an Institute was created by the formation of a Standing Committee of some of the distinguished scholars who had met at Bruges in 1957. This Committee met in Zurich, Switzerland in May 1958 and made plans to create the Institute.

In the autumn of 1961, the Atlantic Institute was formally established in Paris. It is a private institution of leading citizens from Western Europe, Canada and the United States, with the purpose of bringing the intellectual resources of the Atlantic community to bear on its common problems. Its Board of Governors is headed by Paul Van Zeeland, a former prime minister of Belgium, and includes men such as Dr. James Conant, Dr. Kurt Birrenbach, Adlai Stevenson, Lord Gladwyn, William C. Foster, Antoine Pinay, Haakon Lie, and Lester Pearson. Last November, its Policy Committee elected Henry Cabot Lodge to be its first Director-General, and announced a budget of $350,000 for the first year of operation.

C. The Atlantic Convention

The second step of the Resolution mentioned in (A) above was accomplished when approximately 100 distinguished citizen-delegates from all the NATO countries met in Paris January 8, 1962 to explore how to attain greater political and economic cooperation within the Atlantic community. This was a unique gathering: its delegates were appointed by the various governments but were to act as private individuals collectively seeking a solution to a common problem.

The Convention's Preparatory Committee with members from all the NATO countries had met in London in October 1961, and had recommended rules of procedure generally similar to those of the NATO Parliamentarians but with several important differences:

1. The members of the Atlantic Convention will be seated alphabetically by their individual names, and not in the customary national groups. The aim is to stress that they meet as individual citizens, not as government representatives, and to facilitate their knowing one another, voting across national lines and generally developing an Atlantic community spirit.

2. The voting will be by delegates as equal members of the Convention, and not by nations.

3. All decisions will be taken by a simple majority of those present and voting. This rule was adopted after it was pointed out that the Convention could take no actions binding on any government, but could only make recommendations to the NATO governments and peoples.

4. The Convention will tackle the Atlantic problem as a whole in a committee of the whole, instead of dividing into various committees—political, economic, defense, etc. The latter is the standard European practice which Americans have hitherto accepted with hardly a thought of the more fruitful "committee of the whole" approach which the Philadelphia Convention of 1787 followed.

The Atlantic Convention was not arranged directly by agencies of the NATO Parliamentarians—their Resolution was a recommendation to the various governments—but was initiated by the U.S. Citizens Commission on NATO which had been established by U.S. Public Law 86-719 enacted in September 1960. A brochure of the Commission is attached as Appendix I. Such Act had evidently resulted from the persistent efforts of the Atlantic Union Committee and Federal Union for the past eleven years, and from the influence of the resolutions of the NATO Parliamentarians and the Atlantic Congress described above. Since the Convention was still in session at the completion of this paper, nothing can be reported concerning its actions.

A CURSORY APPRAISAL OF FACTORS AFFECTING THE EVOLUTION

The foregoing portion of this study is substantially factual, at least it has been the intention to make it factual. Some inferences will now be drawn concerning the relations of those facts and their portent for the future.

Clarence Streit's concept of uniting all the experienced democracies of the world, conceived in the early thirties, gained considerable momentum in the United States as a result of the unifying tendencies of World War II. Similar momentum in European countries was weakened or lost as most of those countries were defeated and demoralized by the German military forces led by Hitler. The advent of atomic weapons, the creation of the United Nations, and the end of the War diffused and weakened the momentum in the United States. Many of its advocates veered to support of universal world government, hopefully through modification of the United Nations, but, if necessary, through a constitutional convention. Others simply became apathetic.

As the European countries began their reconstruction, the long-dormant urge for European unity resurged and was enhanced by their common plight. However, the former advocates of democratic unity continued to influence unifying tendencies.

Ideological cleavage between the Soviet Union and the "West" coupled with the resurgence of democratic leadership in Germany and Italy increased the momentum for both "brands" of Western unity—European and Atlantic. In the meanwhile the remoteness of Australia and New Zealand, the neutrality of Sweden and Switzerland, and the Brussels Treaty had changed the focus from democratic unity to Atlantic unity.

Three movements gradually formed:

(1) one for European union—through a functional approach.

(2) one for an Atlantic alliance—with gradual de-emphasis of national sovereignty.

(3) one for Atlantic union—the sooner the better.

The first and second movements have made concrete accomplishments exemplified by the three supranational communities in the first instance, and by NATO in the second. The third, naturally more difficult, is now surging—spurred by the ever-increasing challenge of the Soviet Union and encouraged by the experience gained from the other two. This experience has been both positive and negative. The success of the supranational communities has provided confidence for the larger undertaking, and the weaknesses of NATO have added urgency for something stronger.

The desirability of Atlantic union has rarely been denied. Its faltering progress has been due to: (1) long-ingrained habits of nationalism and (2) human reluctance to fundamental change.

The three groups now seem to be merging. The European Unionists are more willing to consider Atlantic Union for two reasons: (1) the progress of European integration has assured them of adequate influence to resist possible United States domination of such a union, and (2) they have witnessed increasing willingness of United States leaders to promote it. The advocates of simple alliance are more ready for closer integration—also for two reasons: (1) they have witnessed the weaknesses of alliance to counter growing challenge of the Soviet Union and (2) they have always favored ever-closer relations but insisted the growth must be gradual. The Atlantic Unionists are more willing to compromise on their basic principle in order to gain the support of the other movements which they consider essential to progress toward the goal of complete federation.

The numerous conferences, proposals, and endorsements of Atlantic Assembly described above seem to portend its formal establishment as an organ of NATO in the near future. Whether or not this happens, the momentum of the movement for Atlantic unity is now so strong that it is quite unlikely to subside before further common institutions are created.●

LEGISLATION TO ENSURE A COLA FOR FEDERAL RETIREES

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, much has been written over the past few weeks concerning the potential for disaster contained in the provisions of Gramm-Rudman. There is no doubt in my mind that this law could wreak havoc on essential programs for the citizens of this great country.

For most people, the impact of Gramm-Rudman will not be felt until March 1 at the earliest. For a group of our Nation's senior citizens, however, Gramm-Rudman has already become a painful reality. Gramm-Rudman, which preserved inflation protection for Social Security recipients, snatched the same benefit away from Federal annuitants and other retirees by eliminating the scheduled January COLA from their annuity checks.

The sudden withdrawal of this COLA is contradictory to policy decisions that were made by Congress earlier last session. The Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits, which I chair, recommended a full COLA in January for Federal retirees. Our recommendation was approved by the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, adopted by the Budget Committee, and passed by the House in its first budget resolution.

Federal retirees, expecting the 1986 COLA, were shocked to learn just 2 weeks before they were supposed to receive their checks that the increase would not be made. Only a few days before Christmas, Federal retirees and others, who had devoted their lives to public service and who had been relying upon the COLA increases, became the first victims of Gramm-Rudman. I was outraged by this provision of the law which is one of the reasons I voted against Gramm-Rudman. To deny retirees, whose annuities average less than $13,000 a year, a COLA increase with no notice is terribly unfair.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that we cannot change the past. Gramm-Rudman is the law unless, or until, the courts declare it unconstitutional. The specific issue of the retroactive COLA denial is before the courts right now. There will be no opportunity for this Congress to restore COLA equity for fiscal year 1986 given the confines of Gramm-Rudman.

Nevertheless, the Congress can restore equal COLA protection for the future, and that is precisely what my legislation would do. My bill guarantees that those who retired from Federal service will receive a full increase in their annuities in 1987—an increase which will be equal to that provided under Social Security—no more, no less. It will also become effective at the same time as the next Social Security COLA—no sooner, no later.

The bill I am introducing today is supported by the National Association of Retired Federal Employees [NARFE] and other groups. It provides an opportunity to restore COLA equity for Federal retirees. As chair of the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits, I urge my colleagues who support this policy to join me in sponsoring this legislation and actively working for its passage in the House.

Mr. Speaker, realistically, we cannot undo the events of the last few weeks. We can prevent, however, the perpetuation of inequitable treatment of those senior citizens who performed the jobs so essential to making our Government work. Unless we act, the automatic provisions of Gramm-Rudman may deny inflation protection to these retirees for 5 years. Full House support for my bill will demonstrate our commitment to equal treatment and protection for our Nation's retired citizens.

I might add that my subcommittee's jurisdiction is limited to civilian retirees of the Federal Government. My proposal does not extend beyond this jurisdiction. However, I would be eager to cosponsor similar legislation for those other groups of retirees who were denied inflation protection under Gramm-Rudman when such legislation is offered by my colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I want to point out that I am very concerned with the unprecedented Federal deficit that is threatening our economy and our National security. We must act to reduce the deficit and place our country on a stronger economic foundation. In so doing, however, we must act with fairness and compassion. The legislation I am introducing today is an important step in bringing equity to our budget reduction efforts.

PENSION LEAK

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the editorial which appeared in the Sunday, January 19, 1986, Washington Post. The editorial recognizes the importance and need for the changes in our Nation's private pension insurance system as proposed in the omnibus budget reconciliation legislation now pending before the Congress. These changes are desperately needed to eliminate the current Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation deficit and to strengthen the termination insurance system for the future.

I ask my colleagues to consider the Post's editorial.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 19, 1986]

PENSION LEAK

One of the things that Congress neglected to do before it left town last month was rescue the nation's pension insurance system. That safety net was erected in 1974, when Congress transformed the law so employers no longer could walk away so easily from promises to pay retirement income to their employees. Companies with pension plans were assessed a fee, so much per covered worker per year. The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. used the fees to help pay benefits when companies went under, or when plans were terminated for other reasons without enough money to cover their costs.

For some time the system worked; since its creation PBGC has taken over nearly 1,100 plans. But more recently the corporation's obligations have begun to outstrip its foreseeable income. The law leaves PBGC no defense: for the sake of the workers involved, it has to take over a plan a company abandons. Some companies, including some very large ones, have taken advantage of this to abandon plans they possibly could have sustained—in a sense shifting a burden to their competitors.

A year ago PBGC's obligations were already about $400 million greater than its likely future ability to pay. Then last summer Allis-Chalmers Corp. dropped about $160 million more in obligations on the agency. Last fall the Wheeling-Pitt Steel Corp., from bankruptcy court, cast off an estimated $425 million more. Other troubled steel companies are also eyeing the agency as a possible source of relief.

Congress moved to deal with the problem last fall in the so-called reconciliation bill required by its budget resolution. The bill was meant to make structural changes in a broad array of programs to reduce their cost and the deficit. The PBGC provisions would have (1) made it harder for companies to slough plans off and (2) raised the fee for solvent companies from $2.60 per employee per year to $8.50. But the reconciliation bill failed in the final hours of the session because the House and Senate could not agree on an unrelated proposal to finance the expansion of the Superfund.

The failure of the reconciliation bill was an embarrassment to Congress on fiscal grounds. In several areas it was costly on policy grounds as well. The members may not have the heart to try again on reconciliation when they return. But in that case the least they can do is pass a pension bill. And quickly.

AN INEXCUSABLE INCIDENT OF GOVERNMENT WASTE

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great frustration that I speak to you about an incident of wasteful Government spending which recently occurred in my State. Mr. Art Brown of Bosque Farms, NM, sent me a copy of a legal notice that appeared in the Albuquerque Journal for 3 days. This notice, shown below, was printed by the Department of the Treasury, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. It informed the citizens of my district that six rounds of .22 caliber ammunition was seized in Otero County, NM for violation of title 18, United States Code, chapter 44. With diligent effort to detail, the notice stated how a person could file a petition in order to reclaim this property.

Mr. Speaker, the value of six rounds of .22 caliber ammunition is about 10 cents. Mr. Art Brown, a hardworking and concerned taxpayer, wrote me to inquire into how much money the Bureau of Tobacco and Firearms spent to confiscate and locate the owner of these bullets. He rightfully pointed out that "if cost percentages were compared, this was a more shameful waste of tax money than the Pentagon purchase of hammers!"

At a time when this country is plagued by record deficits, and must cut into the heart of some of its most important programs, this kind of ridiculous waste cannot be tolerated. How many more similar incidents of this nature have occurred? Certainly, this is an instance where a reduction in Government spending could be made—without detriment to anyone.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY, BUREAU OF ALCOHOL, TOBACCO AND FIREARMS

On October 23, 1985. Six rounds of .22 caliber ammunition was seized in Otero County, New Mexico for violation of Title 18 USC, Chapter 44.

MINORITY HEALTH CONCERNS

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, I would like to bring to my colleagues' attention a recent article on minority health concerns. The article appeared in the December 1985 issue of Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health News, the newsletter of the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration of the Department of Health and Human Services. It reports on the findings of the Secretary of Health and Human Services' Task Force on Black and Minority Health.

According to the article, the task force found that a disparity exists between the health of minorities and other U.S. citizens. They identified six primary causes of death chiefly responsible for the "excess mortality" among U.S. minorities. These were: Homicide, chemical dependence, cancer, cardiovascular disease and stroke, diabetes, and infant mortality. Personally, I am deeply disturbed by these findings.

What is even more disturbing, however, is that not only are blacks and minorities affected disproportionately by these conditions, but they suffer the consequences of them unnecessarily. The report acknowledges that the medical capacity and scientific knowledge to diagnose, treat, and cure such diseases have not been made available to our minority citizens. Moreover, it concludes that until these resources are extended to minorities, they cannot benefit "fully and equitably from the fruits of science or from those systems responsible for translating and using health science technology."

Finally, the task force indicates how far we have to go to ensure equal access to health care for our minority citizens. The report calls on the Department of Health and Human Services "to adopt and foster a broad research agenda, directed toward risk factor identification and sociocultural factors and health outcomes, health education intervention, preventive services interventions and treatment services." Thus, the road to better health for our minority citizens is a long one, and it requires not only research and additional services, but creative and aggressive national leadership.

The article in the ADAMHA News focuses specifically on the findings of most concern to this agency—homicide and chemical dependence. The complete text of the article follows:

[From Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health News, December 1985]

MINORITY HEALTH ADAMHA CONCERN

Two health problems with important implications for ADAMHA—homicide and chemical dependence—are among the six primary causes of death recently identified by the Secretary's Task Force on Black and Minority Health as chiefly responsible for the disparity between the health of U.S. minorities and that of others.

Causes of "excess mortality" among U.S. minority groups identified by the Task Force also include: cancer, cardiovascular disease and stroke, diabetes, and infant mortality.

Secretary Margaret Heckler formed the Task Force in January 1984 to study the health disparities.

Its report stresses that ". . . scientific knowledge and the phenomenal capacity of medicine to diagnose, treat, and cure disease" has not extended to minorities. Until it does, the Task Force concluded, Black and other minorities cannot benefit "fully and equitably from the fruits of science or from those systems responsible for translating and using health science technology."

The report calls on the Department to adopt and foster a broad research agenda directed toward risk factor identification and sociocultural factors and health outcomes, health education intervention, preventive services interventions and treatment services.

Upon releasing the Task Force report Secretary Heckler announced establishment of a new PHS office to provide leadership on efforts to improve the health of minority groups.

The Task Force held that factors critical to understanding the behavioral underpinnings of health, identifying effective strategies for disease prevention, maintaining treatment regimens, and suggesting ways to change behavior for more healthful living habits must be linked together more effectively.

The 18-month review involved six subcommittees. The "Subcommittee on Homicide, Suicide, and Unintentional Injuries" was headed by ADAMHA Deputy Administrator Robert Trachtenberg; the "Subcommittee on Chemical Dependence" was headed by former Food and Drug Administration Deputy Commissioner Mark Novitch. Highlights of the findings of these two groups are given below:

HOMICIDE

National and local homicide data reveal Black males and females and Hispanic males have rates of death "far in excess of the rates of their peers" in the general population. In 1983, according to the subcommittee report, Black-on-Black homicide accounted for 43 percent of the total 19,000 murder victims reported in the U.S. In 1981, the homicide rate for Black males, ages 25 to 34 years, was 136.9 per 100,000 compared with 17.6 for white males of the same age group.

Data collected during the period 1976 to 1980 in the five-State southwestern region of the U.S., where more than 60 percent of Hispanics reside, show the homicide rate was 21.6 per 100,000, "more than 2.5 times the rate of the non-Hispanic white population in the same geographical area," the report holds. National data for homicide deaths among Hispanics were not available.

Native American Indians also have high rates of homicide, 18.1 per 100,000 in 1980—70 percent higher than the rate for the general population.

The disparity caused by deaths due to homicide among the minority populations makes it a major public health problem, the Task Force emphasized.

"Homicide increasingly has been recognized as a preventable public health problem for which the health sector needs to devote greater attention and energy," it reported. "Traditionally, problems of violence and homicide have been left to the criminal justice system. Prevention of homicide is a new endeavor for public health, and it presents an opportunity for the public health field to deal with a previously ignored health problem.

"The high homicide rate," the report says, "can be related to psychological factors involving the mental processes and behavior; external environment including physical, historical-cultural, social, educational, and economic environments; lifestyle, or individual and group ways of life; and physiological factors related to age and gender."

The Task Force noted, "Primary prevention in the public health sense involves averting the initial occurrence of a disease, defect, or injury. In the case of homicide, primary prevention efforts need to be directed at those social, cultural, technological, and legal aspects of the environment in the U.S. that facilitate perpetuation of the Nation's extraordinarily high homicide rates."

The study points to a connection between homicide and alcohol and drug abuse. The National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism has estimated that about one-half of all homicides in the U.S. are related to use of alcohol.

"An estimated 10 percent of homicides nationwide are associated with use of illegal drugs. In some of the Nation's largest cities, the number of drug-related homicides is more than 20 percent," the report states.

CHEMICAL DEPENDENCY

Few studies were found on the drinking behavior of minorities, but the report states that "Blacks appear to be at disproportionately high risk for certain alcohol-related health programs."

For example, National Cancer Institute data show that between 1979 and 1981 the incidence rate of esophageal cancer for Black males, aged 35-44 years, was ten times that of whites. Alcohol consumption is believed to be a primary cause of this cancer.

Black males begin to report high rates of heavy drinking and social problems after the age of 30, compared with white males among whom heavy and problem drinking is concentrated in the age group of 18 to 25 years, the report says.

Hispanic youth tend to drink more heavily than either Black or white youths, ages 18-29, the study finds.

Data from the Indian Health Service showed, "that five of the top ten causes of death among Indians are directly related to alcohol; accidents (21 percent), cirrhosis of the liver (6 percent), alcoholism (3.2 percent), suicide (2.9 percent), and homicide (2 percent). In addition, the report said Native Americans "appear to be at higher risk" for fetal alcohol syndrome/fetal alcohol effects.

The 1982 National Household Survey on Drug Abuse indicates the prevalence of drug use is generally higher in urban areas where minorities are more likely to reside. For this reason, the Task Force reported, "minorities may be at greater risk of drug abuse and, ultimately, the negative social and health consequences associated with drug abuse."

For example minorities are more involved in the intravenous use of drugs, and therefore "are at increased risk of potentially fatal infection from hepatitis B virus, bacterial endocarditis, and acquired immune-deficiency syndrome (AIDS)," the report notes.

Multiple drug use is reported as a problem for all minorities. Data from hospital emergency room cases and from drug abuse treatment programs indicate that Hispanics are more likely than whites to report a primary problem with heroin, cocaine, and PCP.

The report recommends the initiation and expansion of efforts to develop coping skills in children and adolescents, ages 9 to 15 years. Such programs, would be aimed at delaying or preventing the use of substances such as tobacco, drugs, and alcohol, with special emphasis on needs of minorities.

The report further recommends increased studies on the biological consequences of alcohol use as they relate to excess mortality and urged that improved incidence and prevalence data gathering techniques be used to assess alcohol and drug abuse among minority groups.

ADMINISTRATOR ON MINORITY CONCERNS

"ADAMHA is committed to ensuring that the needs of minorities are appropriately addressed in its research, knowledge transfer, and national leadership efforts," said ADAMHA Administrator Donald Ian Macdonald in an immediate response to the report of the Secretary's Task Force on Blacks and Minority Health.

Macdonald sent a memorandum to the directors of the Agency's three institutes, in which he outlined six areas in which minority goals should be established. These areas are research, epidemiology, demonstration programs, technical assistance, knowledge transfer and dissemination, and training.

"I am asking each institute to develop a dynamic and challenging plan which addresses each of these goals and which will constitute ADAMHA's minority strategy. The plan should be detailed and specific so that we can readily track our accomplishments."

Macdonald has designated Dr. Delores Parron, NIMH Associate Director for Special Populations, as ADAMHA's Coordinator for Special Populations to monitor minority activies and to assist Institute Directors in implementing minority strategies.

H.R. 4056

HON. BILL ARCHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, on January 27, I introduced H.R. 4056. This legislation is designed to ensure that current tax law provisions relating to the exclusion of foreign earned income cannot be used by Americans who continue to work in countries where we have banned such employment as a matter of national policy.

H.R. 4065 would specifically deny the foreign earned income exclusion—currently $80,000 per year—available under section 911 of the Internal Revenue Code, to any American resident in a foreign country in violation of an Executive order issued by the President of the United States under the authority granted to him under the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (50 U.S.C. 1701 et seq.) and other existing statutes. This legislation would be effective with respect to income received for services rendered after the effective date of any such Presidential order. Initially, it would be effective for income earned after January 31, 1986.

As the author of legislation that resulted in the 1981 adoption of current section 911 exclusion. I strongly believe that this type of tax provision is essential to the goal of promoting American exports of both goods and services. In light of the recent Presidential order with regard to Libya. I also feel that it is incumbent upon me as an advocate of section 911 to see that it is not used in those situations where we as a nation have no export interest and that is certainly the case with regard to Libya today.

The State Department has estimated that there are between 2,000 and 4,000 Americans still residing in Libya despite the dangers inherent to all foreigners there and the repeated warnings by our Government that Americans should leave. When the President's order takes effect on February 1, those Americans who decide to remain in Libya face fines and/or imprisonment upon their return to U.S. jurisdiction. Our Tax Code should be consistent with all other laws and this requires that we amend the foreign earned income exclusion to prevent persons living in foreign nations in violation of our laws from receiving the current income exclusion.

This legislation is not solely directed at Libya but is drafted to apply generally to all those nations currently designated by Executive order as constituting an unusual and extraordinary threat to our national security and foreign policy. In addition to Libya, there are five other nations who would fall under the provisions of this legislation. They are: First, North Korea—designated by President Truman; second, Cuba—designated by President Kennedy; third, Cambodia—designated by President Nixon; fourth, Vietnam—designated by President Johnson; and fifth, Iran—designated by President Carter.

As a matter of national policy, we should encourage Americans to work overseas representing American goods and services, thus creating jobs at home. However, there are very valid foreign policy considerations which must at times override these trade concerns and that is certainly the situation vis-a-vis Libya and these other five nations. Our Tax Code should work in harmony with our foreign policy and not at cross-purposes. It is for this reason that I believe H.R. 4056 should be expeditiously enacted to eliminate this potential abuse.

TIM GREEN: SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY'S MAN OF EXCELLENCE

HON. GEORGE C. WORTLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, for a few hours this past Sunday, millions of Americans and television viewers around the globe focused their attention on the playing field in the New Orleans Superdome. No matter how one viewed the outcome of Super Bowl XX, the people we are privileged to represent and all who viewed and heard the telecast were treated to a performance of extraordinary athletic excellence and a spectacle that is uniquely American.

What the players and coaches said after the game was an inspiration to the youth of America, no matter what their goals. Each member of the Bears and the Patriots had given their best. To a man, they sent an inspirational message.

This coming Sunday, on February 2, in the 27th Congressional District of New York State, another unique event is scheduled to take place when the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce will hold a dinner to honor a 22-year-old constituent of mine who epitomizes what is best about American youth.

To be honored is Tim Green, the senior All-American tackle of Syracuse University.

Throughout his college career, Tim has made the dean's list while majoring in English literature and pursuing a minor in finance. For the past four semesters, he has maintained a 4.0 average. He is Phi Beta Kappa. And he has found time to offer time and service to such nonprofit activities as the Easter Seals Society, the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation, and the American Red Cross. Besides earning the first-team All-American recognition for his gridiron prowess, he has won All-American academic honors. At the end of this past season, for the second consecutive year, he won a first-team berth on the All-East Team. Sporting News, Pro Football Weekly, and USA Today all picked him as a member of their first teams. He was a Rhodes scholar finalist and was picked to serve as grand marshal for the Syracuse University's graduation ceremonies.

Mr. Speaker, it is with pride that I commend the achievements of Tim Green to the attention of you and our colleagues in the Congress.

I salute his parents, Richard and Judy Green of 13 Kiwi Path, Liverpool.

I expect we will hear much more from Tim Green during the NFL draft and in the years to come as he pursues his goals as an athlete and as a writer.

As those who gave their best in Super Bowl XX, Tim has given all of us an example of excellence.

SPACE SHUTTLE DISASTER

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to learn today of the explosion of the space shuttle Challenger. There are no words sufficient to express the grief I think all of us share when pioneering Americans lose their lives in an effort to further our knowledge of God's creation. When disaster does strike such brave individuals, the duty of the rest of us is to show our gratitude through mourning.

My thoughts are with the families of those lost in today's accident. My prayers will be for them as well.

IN HONOR OF RICHARD GROULX

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, on January 30, 1986, labor leaders throughout the United States, will gather to honor Richard Groulx, executive secretary-treasurer of the Alameda County Central Labor Council, AFL-CIO, upon his retirement after 40 years of service to the trade union movement.

Dick, as he is known to his friends and associates, has had a distinguished career in labor. He has been at the helm of the Alameda County Central Labor Council, which has gained the reputation for being the most progressive AFL-CIO council in the United States, since 1968. From civil rights to peace, Dick Groulx has always been the champion in the forefront to support the cause of labor and justice.

As a young U.S. Marine corporal just discharged from the service in Honolulu, Dick went to the offices of the Culinary Union to offer his services to striking bus workers who were being arrested on false conspiracy charges. He started off writing strike bulletins and assisting as a volunteer. It wasn't long before the Culinary Union hired him as an organizer. His instinctive organizing abilities expanded into major efforts such as the Royal Hawaiian Hotel, the Queen Surf, and other major and smaller hotels in Hawaii.

In 1948, Dick moved to the mainland and settled in Oakland, CA. His high recommendations from Hawaii quickly landed him a job with Teamsters Local 588 as an organizer. From 1948 to 1952, he concentrated on smaller delivery companies and vegetable sheds.

By 1952, he decided to move to the Office and Professional Employees Local 29 where he embarked on an agressive organizing campaign. Within one year he increased the local's membership from 900 to 1200.

"Working with office workers I learned the importance of the Central Labor Council. I was representing and organizing the most oppressed workers—women and minorities" said Dick. He found himself going to the council often for assistance. In turn he offered his help whenever the council needed his help.

In 1956, Dick was asked to run for the position as assistant to the executive secretary-treasurer of the Alameda County Central Labor Council. The rest is history.

He brought a style of leadership and political savvy that has built the Alameda County Central Labor Council into a powerful and influential labor body. Dick considers himself a "gladiator for the labor movement."

I am honored to be a friend of this "gladiator." He has the respect of every rank-and-file worker throughout the labor movement. Even in retirement, this courage, unshakeable dedication and determination will be felt.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO DEA LANGLOIS—LONG BEACH WOMEN'S DEMOCRATIC STUDY CLUB "WOMAN OF THE YEAR"

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am honored today to inform my colleagues that Dea Langlois has been selected as "Woman of the Year" by the Long Beach, CA, Women's Democratic Study Club.

A native of Wisconsin, Dea graduated from business college and moved to Washington, DC, where she worked for the Departments of Justice and Agriculture from 1941-45. In 1946 she began working for the U.S. Navy and met and married her husband, Marv.

In 1951, Dea and Marv bought their present home in Lakewood. Dea attended California State University at Long Beach and began her career in the field of education. She held positions at St. Maria Goretti Elementary, St. Bartholemew's Elementary, St. Anthony's K-12, DeMille Junior High School, and Hughes Junior High School. She retired in 1985 after 26 years of service.

In addition to her professional duties, Dea has somehow managed to find the time to devote countless hours to her community and the Democratic Party. She has been actively involved with the Los Angeles County Democratic Central Committee, Democratic State Central Committee, California Democratic Council, numerous local, State, and national elections and many hearings and meetings relating to the Democratic Party. Additionally, she has been involved with the Long Beach Math Association, California Math Council, National Council of the Teachers of Mathematics, Teachers Association of Long Beach, California Teachers Association, and National Education Association.

Mr. Speaker, Dea Langlois has done much over the years in helping make the Lakewood-Long Beach area such a special place to live and work. And her commitment to the Democratic Party has not gone unnoticed by her colleagues across the State of California. My wife, Lee, joins me in congratulating Dea on this special occasion and we wish her and her husband, Marv, and their daughter, Cheri, continued success and happiness in all their future endeavors.

HANDS OFF OUR HEROES

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, in his annual heroes of the Union address the President enshrines veterans of one feat or another. In most cases, the achievements are well worth venerating and the heroes are in the public domain.

Not so with our Democratic heroes. This Republican President freely borrows our Democratic Presidents, pelted though they were by his party while they were in public office, and installs them in his pantheon.

Franklin Roosevelt, Harry Truman, and John Kennedy have all been posthumously volunteered by Reagan to serve the GOP. Mr. President, it's time to call "halt," it's time to call "HOOH"—hands off our heroes.

President Reagan does a disservice to the pantheon of Republican heroes, whose names are never mustered to duty. We all know them by heart: Hoover, Harding, Nixon, Ford, the list runs on.

I hope this evening we will see the President return his party to its grand old traditions.

DR. WILLIAM MOODY, INNOVATIVE EDUCATOR OF CHILDREN

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a joint resolution of the U.S. Congress commending Dr. William Moody for creating and implementing a unique and effective process oriented curriculum known as the Renaissance curriculum.

With illiteracy increasing in the United States year by year and now reaching an alarmingly high rate, with public school dropout rates intolerably high, the distinguished work of Dr. William Moody is an inspiration to all concerned about the educational development of American children.

The Renaissance curriculum comprises the Rudy Reader Early Reading Program, the Barrett Math Program, the Moody French Language Experience Program, the Mystery High Reading Program for older nonreaders, the Philosophy for Children Program, and chess, music, and dance among other curriculum components.

As ample and dramatic proof of the success of this curriculum, P.S. 149 in Harlem, New York City, raised its reading score from 13.6 to 56.1 percent in 1985, which was reading at or above the national norm for its grade.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in commending Dr. William Moody and his effective and unique educational contributions.

TRIBUTE TO THE UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC WOMEN'S VOLLEYBALL TEAM

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 28, 1986

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleagues join with me today in paying tribute to the members of the University of the Pacific Women's Volleyball Team, crowned the NCAA Division I National Champions on December 22, 1985. The UOP team defeated Stanford in an exciting final with game scores of 15 to 17, 15 to 7, 15 to 12, 15 to 13.

The members of the team are an enthusiastic group of young women who will be honored by several hundred equally enthusiastic fans at a special banquet on February 9 in my hometown of Stockton, CA. I plan to attend that special event, and it will be my pleasure to share with the team the joint congratulations of my colleagues in the House in this manner.

Congratulations to a fine group of young athletes.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, January 29, 1986

The House met at 3 p.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

As the Nation struggles with the sorrow of yesterday and the families of the astronauts know the intensity of grief and pain, we ask You, O gracious God, to hear our prayer. We pray not for easy answers to perplexing questions, but we pray that Your abiding presence will help heal the hurt and Your spirit will give strength. We are reminded that we do not have in this world an abiding city, yet we can be confident that in all things Your peace that passes all human understanding is ever with us and will never depart from us. We pray especially for the families whose joy has been turned to mourning. Bless them and comfort them, and give to each of us a new awareness of Your providence and Your everlasting grace. In Your name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 274. Concurrent resolution providing for a joint session of Congress to receive a message from the President on the State of the Union.

RETIREMENT OF ANN CATON

(Mr. MOAKLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is my honor today to announce the retirement of Ann Caton from the U.S. Capitol Guide Service. Annie has given 25 years of dedicated service as a Capitol tour guide, sharing with people from all over the country and the world her knowledge and experience of our Nation's legislative branch of Government. During her 25 years on Capitol Hill approximately 80 million people have visited the Capitol, many of whom are my own constituents and have personally conveyed to me how much they enjoyed their tour of the Capitol as well as Annie's friendly and gracious manner.

I'm sure I can speak for all my colleagues when I say that Annie will be sorely missed. However, I also know that we all wish her well in her much deserved retirement back to Cape Cod with her husband Bill. Good luck Annie, and thanks for all your hard work and dedication on behalf of the U.S. Congress.

CHRISTA McAULIFFE

(Mr. GREGG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, this is a period of immense loss for America. In New Hampshire, we are stunned, thinking of the lives of the crew, but especially Christa.

Concord is a small city; New Hampshire is a small State. A community really. Christa was our friend, our neighbor, and our source of pride. Our love goes out to Steve and her children.

Christa represented so many things that have come to characterize our small State and our great Nation. Her energy, her enthusiasm. Her belief in challenging the unknown, her concern for others, especially for students. She was extraordinary and yet typical of our land and our history. A mother, a wife, a teacher, a seeker of the future.

We will miss her entirely, but we will not forget those qualities and dreams which she and the rest of the shuttle crew so personified. She lived as our neighbor, and yet she defines our Nation.

IN HONOR OF A GREAT SPACE PIONEER, LT. COL. ELLISON S. ONIZUKA, USAF

(Mr. AKAKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, so much has already been said, and so eloquently, of yesterday's space shuttle tragedy. Nevertheless, I would like to share a few thoughts with you this morning, for Challenger's loss, a major tragedy for our country, is a personal one for me. A man I am honored to have known, Lt. Col. Ellison S. Onizuka, was one of the seven who so valiantly gave their lives for the benefit of our country and the world.

I was yet a newcomer to Congress when Ellison was selected as an astronaut candidate by NASA in January 1978. I remember going to the Island of Hawaii, Ellison's birthplace, to inform his mother, Mrs. Mitsue Onizuka, of the great news. Rarely have I seen such display of jubilation and pride as at that moment. Mrs. Onizuka knew that, for Ellison, this was greater than any dream ever imagined. For years, Ellison had idolized astronauts, and he fancied the thought of someday being involved in the Space Program, in any capacity.

One year later, Ellison became eligible for assignment as a mission specialist on future space shuttle flight crews. After 6 more years of training, on January 24, 1985, Ellison saw his greatest dream come true as he became a member of of the Discovery mission. During the mission Ellison was responsible for the primary payload activities, which included the deployment of a modified inertial upper stage [IUS]. And, with the completion of Discovery's 48 orbits of the Earth before landing at Kennedy Space Center on January 27, Ellison logged a total of 74 hours in space.

I was fortunate to have been in attendance at the launching of that exciting voyage, and with the Onizuka family and a host of well-wishers, I shared in the historic moment.

For the people of Hawaii, and especially for the children, Ellison became a hero. He was the first Hawaiian astronaut in the history of the Space Program, and in this role, he inspired and motivated all. Ellison hardly gave up a chance to speak of his experiences, and often took time to visit local schools.

Last September, Ellison honored me by appearing on my monthly talk show. We talked of his first mission, and his impressions of that voyage. He left no doubt in my mind that the experience was more fulfilling than he had even imagined it would be. I recall asking him if there was a single sensation which he had not experienced in simulation exercises. He said that the few seconds at liftoff were the worst. The crackling, crunching sound resulting from those thousands and thousands of pounds of rocket force left him with the feeling that the entire vessel was about to cave in. That was the worst part.

This weekend, at Ellison's invitation, I planned to go to Houston to share in homecoming festivities. Friends and family were to arrive from distant Hawaii, laden with foods that Ellison so loved, in honor of his triumphant return.

We shall not share in such festivities together. Instead, with Ellison's death, we shall share a deep sense of loss. I grieve for Ellison, and my thoughts are with his wife, Lorna, his children, Janelle and Darien, and the host of loved ones he has left behind.

Yet, it is up to us, the living, to look to the light which Ellison has left us. This great space pioneer, who so willingly lived his lifelong dream, is a symbol of perseverance and strength. Ellison shall forever live in our hearts and our memories. We do him justice only through our actions and through our continued support of the work which he so loved. Ellison best exhibited his commitment when he said, "There are a lot of outcomes of these projects which will benefit both our society and the rest of the world."

Let us never forget this great man. But, more importantly, let us never forget what he truly valued, the betterment of society and the rest of the world. It is up to us to ensure that even in his death Ellison's vision lives on.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE SANDINISTA REGIME

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, the United States and the world have reacted with stunned disbelief and sadness at the loss of the space shuttle Challenger and its crew. It's difficult to express the sorrow we all feel and the sympathy we extend to each crew member's family and friends.

The shock of yesterday's events is compounded by what I learned this morning of the reaction of the Salvadoran guerrillas to this tragedy. Radio Venceremos, the F.M.L.N. radio station for the Salvadoran guerrillas, which is known to originate its broadcasts out of Managua, gave a report early this morning on the space shuttle tragedy. I quote:

Given that the Challenger's ostentatious failure represents an overwhelming blow to the U.S. Government's plans to extend the war to outer space and given that two war criminals have died aboard the Challenger, we share the happiness felt by those who reject and condemn the U.S. imperialism war-mongering policy.

That represents the attitude we face with the Salvadoran guerrillas and the Sandinista regime in Managua guiding them.

OUR GREAT HEROES DID NOT DIE IN VAIN

(Mr. LEVINE of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, our Nation suffered a devastating and tragic loss yesterday. Words cannot express the sorrow that I know every one of us in this Chamber feel, and every one of us in this country feel.

We must now come to terms with our grief and our sorrow. As horrible as this tragedy is, it would be compounded if we were to listen to those inevitable voices of timidity and fear who call for an end to our manned space program. If we were to allow the deaths of these seven American heroes to weaken our commitment to exploring outer space, they surely would have died in vain.

Mr. Speaker, now is the time to remember President John F. Kennedy's words in his 1961 State of the Union Address when he said:

Now it is time for a great new American enterprise which may hold the key to our future on Earth. The eyes of the world now look into space to the Moon and the planets beyond. We have vowed that we shall not see it governed by a flag of conquest, but by a banner of freedom and peace. We have vowed that we shall not see space filled with weapons of mass destruction; but with instruments of knowledge and understanding. Yet the vows of this Nation can only be fulfilled if we are first.

Mr. Speaker, it is because of people like Francis Scobee, Michael Smith, Judy Resnik, Ellison Onizuka, Ronald McNair, Gregory Jarvis, and Christa McAuliffe that the United States has led the way into outer space for the last 2½ decades. The five men and two women who lost their lives yesterday are great heroes. Their sacrifice can never be forgotten.

SALVADORAN COMMUNISTS EXPRESS HAPPINESS OVER SPACE SHUTTLE TRAGEDY

(Mr. BROOMFIELD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, as we, and all decent people mourn yesterday's tragic national loss, I am angry and shocked that anyone could find joy in the terrible accident. While our country and the world mourn, the Communist terrorist rebel radio in El Salvador stooped to an all time low in expressing its "happiness" over this incident.

It is important to note that this crude and insensitive statement was made by a Communist umbrella group which claims to represent peace and the Salvadoran people. How could any group which claims national aspirations dare to vilify the names of dedicated men and women who gave their lives in the exploration of space

It is also important to compare this Communist guerrilla group, which aspires to represent the people of El Salvador, with the leadership of President Duarte who is struggling valiantly to bring about peace and democracy for all his people. In view of the statement of the guerrillas, he strongly deserves our full support.

BENEFITS FOR SURVIVORS OF NEWFOUNDLAND AIR CRASH

(Mr. MONTGOMERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to speak of another tragedy. I want to update my colleagues on the status of GI life insurance payments to survivors of the service men and women killed December 12 in the Newfoundland plane crash.

I have been advised that all but one of the 248 servicemembers who died were covered by this insurance. For some reason, that individual soldier had declined, in writing, to participate in the insurance program.

The Veterans' Administration has told me that 180 claims have been approved, 12 cases are being developed and the remaining beneficiaries have not yet returned claim forms. Each claim is being paid the day after receipt of the application.

In November, you may recall, we passed H.R. 505, which included an increase in the maximum servicemen's group life insurance from $35,000 to $50,000, effective January 1, 1986. We later rolled back the effective date by a new law in the latter part of December and as a result, the families of these servicemembers will receive an extra $15,000 insurance payment.

GRAMM-RUDMAN PRESCRIBES THE WRONG MEDICINE

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, in fiscal year 1986 debt-servicing will cost $200 billion as compared with general tax revenues of $500 billion. This is 40 percent of the general revenue funds. In other words, 40 cents of every tax-dollar collected will be spent, not by this Government, but by its creditors. Moreover, as the Congressional Budget Office projections show, this ratio will rise to 48 cents of every tax-dollar collected in 1990. I wish to remind the House, Mr. Speaker, that under the gold standard, debt-servicing typically cost 3 cents of the tax-dollar collected.

Gramm-Rudman, for all its massive spending cuts, will not be able to change this outrageous ratio substantially, because no substantial reduction in the cost of debt-servicing is envisaged. Unless something more imaginative than the Gramm-Rudman proposals are adopted, this Government will be reduced to a collection agency, not to say a foreclosure agency, acting on behalf of the coupon-clipper class. It might even face a tax-revolt, if the agitation on the part of the spenders triggered tax increases in lieu of spending cuts, according to the provisions of Gramm-Rudman.

The cost of debt-servicing is high because the value of the dollar was destabilized in 1971, sending interest rates into the outer space. The proper medicine is to stabilize the dollar, which would immediately pull interest rates back to the Earth's gravitation, would reduce the cost of debt-servicing to 3 cents of each tax dollar collected and, incidentally, would also wipe out three-quarters of the budget deficit without tax increases or spending cuts.

NEW SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE LACKS FAMILY FARM BACKGROUND

(Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, in the midst of a farm crisis President Reagan has now appointed a new Secretary of Agriculture. Dick Lyng is a good fellow, I like him, and I wish him well. However, I would like to say to the President that I am disappointed by the appointment.

Instead of someone with "hands-on" family farm experience coming to this administration, we now have another person who comes basically from corporate agriculture. I am sure we will continue the unbending approach of the influence of corporate agriculture in the formulation of agriculture policies in this administration.

To coin an old phrase, "this is a chip off the old block." Richard Lyng will be required, as John Block was, to subscribe to Herbert Hoover's farm policies that this President advises this Congress to adopt. The way to solve the farm problem, he says, is simply to get rid of farm price supports. What he means is to get rid of family farmers and have a Nation of corporate farms.

Mr. Speaker, family farmers are on the brink of extinction in this country. We must in this Chamber fiercely fight to preserve them. We especially need a Secretary of Agriculture who knows and cares about family farmers and comes up to the Cabinet table in the White House and speaks persuasively for their interests.

LOWER INTEREST FARM LOANS COULD NOW BECOME REALITY

(Mr. LIGHTFOOT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, interest costs weigh heavily in whether or not farmers can stay in business these days. The ripple effect of interest rates carries over to all commercial farm lenders and rural communities as a whole.

For that reason, I have devoted considerable effort in the past few months to developing a workable plan to offer lower cost farm loan funding.

After consulting with farmers, bankers, and lawyers, I have developed a realistic plan which I am introducing today.

The plan calls for "Ag America" savings certificates to be issued by the U.S. Treasury. Any American will be able to purchase these savings certificates in denominations from $10 to $1,000 through banks, which will be allowed to offer competitive rates. At maturation rates of 10, 15, or 20 years, taxpayers will have the incentive of tax exemption on interest earned on the certificates.

Proceeds from certificate sales will form a Farm Trust Fund to be managed by the Secretary of Agriculture, in consultation with the Treasury Secretary. Farm lenders will be eligible to bid for funds from this pool, on the condition that the funds be used only for farm loans at no greater than 9 percent interest.

In the likelihood that Congress decides to consider credit assistance for farm lenders this year, I am offering this proposal as an alternative to other types of aid packages.

This plan is workable for the entire farm lending sector and is less costly to the taxpayer than many options being debated. Furthermore, leading agricultural economists have suggested that help with interest rates would be one of the more workable and cost effective options for providing financial assistance to the troubled farm sector.

I welcome my colleagues' consideration of and support for my proposal.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, KANSAS

(Mr. SLATTERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, today is the 125th birthday of the great State of Kansas.

In 1861 the South had seceded from the Union, President-elect Lincoln was preparing for his inauguration, and after years of bloodshed, Kansas entered the Union as a free State.

The pioneer values of independence, freedom, hard work, and neighbor helping neighbor are a way of life in my State of Kansas. The focus of Kansas communities, large and small, has always been on family, friends, and faith. That remains our focus today.

Kansas is my home by birth and by choice. I am proud to say that I would not want to live anywhere else.

Today the State of Kansas celebrates its 125th birthday with all the pride, optimism, and dignity befiting a great State that has weathered many storms, a State that nourishes our Nation and other nations with its grain and with its ideals.

Happy birthday, Kansas.

A DRUMBEAT THAT SURPASSES COLOR

(Mr. COATS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, Monday I referred to the recent CBS News special on black families, and inserted for the record David Broder's column entitled "Drumbeat for the Family."

Today I would like to highlight from that documentary the comments of Caroline Wallace, who together with her husband run a youth center in the heart of Newark, NJ. I believe her message should be heard by all our Nation's policymakers.

When asked by Bill Moyers if moral values had changed, she said,

"Oh yes [today], it's morally acceptable to have babies. It was not morally acceptable years ago. That's what's hurting the black family."

But then Moyers asks, "even though the messages from the society that the kids are getting seem to say do anything you want to, the U.S. Government, the Governor of New Jersey, a white man like Moyers, cannot step in and say to young black kids it's just not right to have children out of wedlock, welfare needs to be changed, you've got to take responsibility, who's going to say these things to kids?"

"Why can't you say it?" Mrs. Wallace asked.

"They won't listen to me," Moyers said.

"Doesn't make any difference," Wallace replies. "You've got to say it anyway. They may not listen to me either. I'm saying that if you say it in your corner and I say it in my corner, and if everybody is saying it, it is going to be like a drumbeat. And sooner or later it will sound. But it's not just for me to talk about, it's for all of us to talk about. And I think it's going to surpass color."

I urge my colleagues to hear the message of Caroline Wallace, and join in the drumbeat.

THE BANKS WANT TO EXACT A PRICE FOR CONSUMER RIGHTS

(Mr. ST GERMAIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, the American consumer gained a clean-cut victory when the House passed H.R. 2443, legislation to give bank customers timely access to their deposits.

No sooner had the House acted than rumors began circulating around the lobbyists' watering holes that the banks—who have lived high off the delayed funds game—planned to exact a new price from the consumer if H.R. 2443 was to become law.

The banks, unabashed by their billions of dollars of profits from the delayed funds, are now demanding a variety of new powers as a quid pro quo for giving the consumers the right to their funds as provided by H.R. 2443.

"Sure, we'll let our customers have their money if the Senate lets us dabble in retail businesses, the securities market, insurance, and whatever high-risk investment that happens to come along—of course, all the while with fewer regulators looking over our shoulders," seems to be the outline of the banks' demands—their price—for granting consumer rights. "We'll let you be protected for a price," is the banks' rallying cry.

It'll be interesting to see whether the Senate will protect consumers' basic rights without having to pay a further price.

The merits of the various items on the banks' legislative wish list should be decided on their own and not piled on the blistered shoulders of the already overburdened American consumer.

LEGISLATION PROVIDING FOR ANNUAL TEACHERS' APPRECIATION DAY

(Mr. SHAW asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, yesterday our Nation witnessed the tragic explosion of the space shuttle Challenger. Not only was this a loss to the families and loved ones of the Challenger's crew, but it was also a tragic loss to the schoolchildren and teachers of this Nation, for among the crew was a schoolteacher who was to have been the first private citizen in space.

I think all would agree that Christa McAuliffe was a great representative of the teaching profession and that she embodied all the qualities found in great teachers, she was dedicated to her profession, dedicated to her students, and dedicated to the excitement of learning and discovery. She had hoped that her participation in the Space Shuttle Program would provide an example to children across the country to strive and push their abilities to the limit.

I feel this example of commitment to teaching should be honored. On December 12, 1985, I introduced a bill to provide for annual Teachers Appreciation Day, a day to be set aside each and every year in which we honor those who have taught us and are teaching our children.

I think it would be an appropriate tribute at this time, and I urge all my colleagues to sign on this bill as a cosponsor.

A TRIBUTE TO THOSE WHO FLY THE SPACE SHUTTLE

(Mr. PEASE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, like all Americans, I am stunned and deeply saddened by the loss of the space shuttle Challenger and her brave crew.

At this time of sorrow we are reminded, yet again, of the inherent risks involved in the probing of space. It is a tribute to those who fly the space shuttle that the knowledge of these risks did not deter them from their duty.

We must not lose sight of the courage of these individuals who represent so much of what is good about America.

Our hearts go out to the families of the crew. Their loss is deep and personal, and so is that of the entire Nation.

LEGISLATION TO HONOR GERALD R. FORD, 38TH PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

(Mr. DAUB asked and was given permissions to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to honor Gerald R. Ford, our 38th President of the United States. This legislation will give authority to the Secretary of the Interior to enter into a cooperative agreement for the purpose of providing technical assistance for the interpretation and marking of the birthplace of President Ford, located in Omaha, NE.

President Ford was born in Omaha on July 14, 1913. His birthsite burned in 1971, but Mr. James Paxson developed the site as a memorial to President Ford in 1975. Mr. Paxson has since donated the birthsite to the city of Omaha.

Mr. Speaker, President Ford's rise to become the 38th President followed a long and distinguished career in this body, where he was liked and respected by his colleagues. When he became President, his decency and integrity contributed greatly toward leading this country through difficult times.

I appreciate this opportunity to honor President Ford for his accomplishments, and I commend Mr. Paxson and the city of Omaha for their efforts with regard to the Ford birthsite.

NAMING SEVEN MOONS OF URANUS IN HONOR OF SEVEN LOST ASTRONAUTS

(Mr. NELSON of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Speaker accorded to me the privilege of addressing the House during the passage of a House resolution concerning the Challenger crew and I shared with the Speaker and I shared with our colleagues that for the past 4 months that I had been privileged to work side by side, to play, to eat, to enjoy the company of this group of brave Americans.

Mr. Speaker, we are still consumed in the numbness of the national tragedy. I would propose to the House, Mr. Speaker, and I will follow up with appropriate legislation, that perhaps one way of keeping etched the memory of these seven brave astronauts is now that we have discovered more than seven new moons of the planet Uranus and since these moons have been discovered by a product of American technology, the spacecraft that has been traveling for years, and since that spacecraft is a part of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, we ought to consider naming at least seven of those moons after these seven departed brothers and sisters.

MEMORIAL TO HONOR AMERICAN ASTRONAUTS WHO HAVE PERISHED IN SPACE EXPLORATION

(Mr. BADHAM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Speaker, prompted by the tragedy of yesterday that occurred to our dedicated and brave souls flying the Challenger, I have been prompted by that to introduce legislation, which I will today, to establish a memorial to honor America's astronauts who have perished in the quest of conquering, understanding, and exploring space. I would encourage my colleagues to join me in support of this resolution to have a memorial for those who have given the ultimate sacrifice to their country toward the exploration of space. It would be privately established under the auspices of the Smithsonian Institution.

I would welcome the support that we might dedicate a memorial to the seven who perished so tragically yesterday, in addition to the three who perished 19 years ago.

TRIBUTE TO THE TWO WOMEN ASTRONAUTS LOST ON SPACE FLIGHT

(Mrs. BOXER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, people far more eloquent have spoken of the unforgettable tragedy of yesterday. The shuttle crew was the best representative of America, black, white, Asian, all religions, men and women.

I would like for a moment to speak as a woman, to say how proud the two women on the shuttle made me feel. They not only were seeking new frontiers in space, they were living proof of the new frontiers of equality. All the astronauts will be missed, but their contributions and their role models will be long remembered.

As a mother, as a wife, as a daughter, my heart goes out to all the families whose personal loss really can never be measured.

OUR SPACE PROGRAM IS A NATIONAL TREASURE

(Mr. RITTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, our Space Program is a national treasure. It is a place where team America gets to put its best foot forward for ourselves and for all of human civilization.

The accident was a terrible tragedy, personal and national. It remains a very real setback, but we cannot let it deter us from the greater goal of exploring the heavens.

When the frontiers were on land or at sea, there were setbacks, too; but it was then and it is now in our nature to explore. The space voyagers who perished yesterday would have it no other way.

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH A NATIONAL TEACHER RECOGNITION DAY ON JANUARY 28 EVERY YEAR

(Mr. ACKERMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, the image of our children across the Nation watching in horror as celebration turned to nightmare, will haunt America for years. In tribute to the memory of Christa McAuliffe, an authentic American hero, I am introducing legislation today to establish a permanent National Teacher Recognition Day to be celebrated on January 28 every year.

I call on all of my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this joint resolution.

As a former schoolteacher myself, I keenly feel the loss of this rare woman who inspired educators and students to go beyond the average and the mundane. However painful it is to remember, we must always cherish the pioneering spirit that led Christa McAuliffe and our brave astronauts to break the barriers of the unknown.

If our children are our most valuable resource—and they are—then our educators are entrusted with our most sacred responsibility. It is only appropriate that we should set aside 1 day out of the year to celebrate their contributions to our Nation, on the day that one of the profession's brightest stars was taken from us.

TRAGEDY STRIKES THE "CHALLENGER"

(Mr. FASCELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FASCELL Mr. Speaker, with stunning abruptness tragedy struck in the blue skies over Florida. The explosion of the space shuttle Challenger and the death of its seven-member crew leaves us appalled, bewildered, and heartsick.

As a nation, we mourn the loss of the five men and two women who died on this ill-fated mission. As a people, our hearts go out to their families and loved ones. As individuals, we offer our prayers to the victims of this disaster, both those who died and those who remain behind.

As NASA's scientists work to determine what went wrong so that this will never happen again, the rest of us can only feverishly search our hearts and minds for words of comprehension and comfort. And, somehow, words never seem adequate to the task.

We have, perhaps, been spoiled by our Nation's magnificent successes in space. One glorious mission after another. We have come to accept such successes as routine.

Now we are reminded that such successes are never routine, that each mission is fraught with potential dangers, and that each generation has sent its sons and daughters into the perils of the unknown in search of knowledge and understanding.

The search will go on, as indeed it must. And if there is any single lesson to be learned from the tragedy of the Challenger, it is this: That men and women will always be found who are willing to risk all in the search for human understanding. And that spirit must never be lost.

SINGLE POLL CLOSING TIME FOR PRESIDENTIAL GENERAL ELECTIONS IN THE CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to House Resolution 329 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 3525.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 3525) to amend title 3, United States Code, to establish uniform regional poll closing times in the continental United States for Presidential general elections, with Mr. BARNARD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SWIFT] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SWIFT].

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 3525 is a bill to establish a single poll closing time in the continental United States for Presidential general elections. It was reported from the Committee on House Administration by voice vote, with bipartisan support.

H.R. 3525 is an important bill that will solve a serious problem that exists—and has existed for some time—in our Presidential elections. The problem is that the outcome of an election can be determined and announced before all voters in this country have had an opportunity to cast their ballots.

The process that takes place on election day, the voting process, is a cornerstone of our democracy. We go to great lengths to preserve the integrity of that process. To ensure that it is fair, accurate, open, and honest, and that voters are able to exercise their rights and privileges without hinderance.

But over the last two decades the integrity of election day has gradually been eroded in one crucial respect. With advances in election technology it has become possible to predict with extreme accuracy the outcome of an election before all polls for that election are closed. Thousands of voters are told, in effect, that the election has been held without them, and that their votes do not count.

The developing problem came to a head most recently in 1980 when the outcome of the Presidential race was announced on network television at 5:15 Pacific time. At that time, polls were still open in approximately half the States. In every time zone: several in the eastern time zone; about a third in the central time zone; and all in the mountain, Pacific, Alaskan, and Hawaiian time zones.

In the second largest State in the Union—New York—there was nearly an hour remaining before polls would be closed. And in the largest State, the one with more voters than any other—California—there were nearly 3 hours remaining before polls would be closed.

What ensued was accurately described by Columnist David Broder as an "uproar." Millions of voters felt that their franchise was undermined. There were even assertions that the projections had affected the outcomes of some elections. Particularly State and local elections that often have relatively small numbers of voters and are decided by narrow margins.

In response to the tremendous public outcry, this House, through the Committee on House Administration and the Committee on Energy and Commerce, became actively involved in seeking to ensure that every voter has the opportunity to cast a ballot before the results of an election are announced. In seeking a way to do that, we held numerous hearings over the last several years, both here in Washington, DC, and in other cities around the country.

What we found was that the problem of early projections of election returns had two parts, and therefore that any solution would also have to be a two-part solution.

The first part of the problem was new in 1980. That was the network use of "exit polls" to make their election projections.

Exit polls are interviews with voters as they leave the voting booth. They have been around for several election cycles, and have been used to provide accurate information on voting patterns and on questions of who votes for whom and why. What was new in 1980 was the use of that data to predict the outcome of the election while voting was still going on. The networks have discovered that they can often project the outcome of a Presidential election within a few hours after the polls open, and certainly well before they are closed everywhere.

Eliminating that part of the problem turned out to be a difficult proposition. Any attempt to legislate restrictions on the television networks would immediately become tangled in arguments over the first amendment rights of the press. So we moved instead to exert public pressure on the networks to voluntarily refrain from announcing election results before polls were closed. Pressure came from many quarters, including a congressional resolution that was passed overwhelmingly last year, calling on the networks to exercise voluntary restraint.

Early last year that effort finally paid off.

After 4 years of working on this issue, we achieved a major breakthrough when the three television networks finally joined with Westinghouse Broadcasting and with Turner Broadcasting and agreed that they will not use their exit polling data to make election projections until the polls in a State are closed.

That agreement, important as it was, solved half of the problem—but not all of it. The second part of the problem we found is simply that this is a large country, spanning several time zones, made up of States with widely varying poll closing times. Therefore, polls in some parts of the country are closed hours before polls in other parts of the country. Furthermore, we have a winner-take-all electoral college system. In short, it is quite possible for actual vote totals from places where polls are closed to reveal the outcome of an election while polls elsewhere are still open.

Only a nationwide uniform poll closing time can prevent that from happening.

The Senate first recognized this situation in the mid-1970's. They passed uniform poll closing proposals on several different occasions. Unfortunately, at that time the House did not act. And, when the problem was compounded in 1980 with the advent of projections based on exit polls, we had to go back and solve the exit polling part of the problem first.

Having done that, we are once again to the point where a uniform poll closing time will finally and completely eliminate the problem of having the outcome of an election determined and announced before people in all parts of the country have had an opportunity to vote.

Last year we set to work on the second part of the solution to our problem, a uniform poll closing time. Our hearings were devoted to finding the best uniform poll closing proposal. The bills before us included Sunday voting, 24-hour voting, directing the Federal Election Commission to select a poll closing time, closing the polls at 11 p.m. e.s.t., and closing the polls at 10:30 p.m. e.s.t.

We talked to secretaries of State, local election officials, political party people, representatives of citizens' groups and unions, Members of the House and local broadcasters.

By the conclusion of the hearings, a general consensus had developed with respect to several potential aspects of a uniform poll closing proposal.

First, election day should remain on Tuesday.

Second, there was widespread agreement that any bill should apply to Presidential general election day only. Election officials in some States felt that polling times for other Federal and State elections should be brought into line with the polling time in the Presidential election, in the interest of consistency from one election to the next. Other officials were not certain they would want to adopt that time for all elections.

And, since the problem we are trying to solve occurs in the Presidential general election, the overwhelming consensus was that Federal legislation should affect that one election only, and that each State should be left to decide for itself which course to pursue for other elections.

The third point of general agreement was that any bill should address poll closing times only, not poll openings. Only the poll closing time is a factor in early projections, so the general feeling from the hearings was that only the poll closing time should be included in any legislation. States will then be free to keep or alter their opening times as they see fit.

Finally, with respect to the actual poll closing time, the information developed in the hearings suggested that an 11 p.m. closing, or even a 10 p.m. closing would be difficult for eastern election officials to administer. Election officials expressed considerable concern about cost, the difficulty of recruiting poll workers, security, and other problems that would arise with poll closings so late. They were much more comfortable with a 9 p.m. closing—which already exists in New York, Rhode Island, and Iowa—and which election officials generally felt would present few major difficulties for the eastern, central, and mountain time zones. For the Pacific time zone, however, a poll closing of 6 p.m. Pacific standard time is just too early. The poll closing time there cannot realistically be earlier than 7 p.m. local time.

Briefly, what we had then was that in the East—where we were pleased that we found widespread willingness to contribute to a solution—election officials felt that they could administer a 9 p.m. closing, but they made cogent arguments about the difficulties of a later closing. People in the West were willing to close their polls an hour earlier, at 7 p.m. local time, but felt that an earlier closing would have a detrimental effect on voter turnout.

Since there is a difference of only 2 hours between 7 p.m. in the West and 9 p.m. in the East, while the actual time difference between East and West is 3 hours, we needed a way to eliminate an hour of the time difference.

After weighing all of the information, data, suggestions, proposals, and ideas from our hearings, the committee adopted a proposal put forward in our hearings by the secretary of State of Massachusetts and the secretary of State of California, among others. It is exactly the proposal that is currently included in H.R. 3525.

Under this plan, two things will happen:

First, polls will close at 9 p.m. eastern standard time—which is 8 p.m. c.s.t. and 7 p.m. m.s.t.

Second, in the Pacific time zone, in Presidential election years only, in order to achieve a 7 p.m. poll closing, daylight saving time will be extended for 2 weeks—which means the four and one-half States in the Pacific time zone will be on daylight saving time on election day while everyone else is on standard time.

Since 7 p.m. Pacific daylight time is the same as 9 p.m. eastern stardard time, uniformity is achieved.

This proposal commended itself to the committee for a number of reasons. Among them are:

It achieves uniformity, so all polls will close simultaneously on the Presidential election day.

It does so while keeping poll closing times within the limits—9 p.m. in the East and 7 p.m. in the West—that election officials are confident they can administer effectively.

No State will be required to close its polls either later—9 p.m. local time—or earlier—7 p.m. local time—than many States now do.

Similarly, no State will be required to have a voting day either longer—15 hours—or shorter—11 hours—than some States now do.

Fully 27 percent of the States—more than one-fourth—will not have to change their poll closing hours at all.

States that will be required to extend their closing hours will be extending them by less than under any other proposal. None will change more than 3 hours and, if those few choose to adjust their opening times, as they have complete authority to do, the change will be less.

It is a good proposal, and it provides the necessary last piece of the complete solution what will protect the integrity of election day for all citizens in all parts of the country.

To summarize, Mr. Chairman, since 1980 this committee has been assembling the pieces of a plan that will once again ensure at least a minimal degree of protection for election day. A major piece of the plan fell into place early last year when the television broadcasters agreed that they would not use exit polling data to intrude on the period of time when voting is underway.

The final step necessary to complete the plan is to have the voting process finished simultaneously across the country. This bill, H.R. 3525, as amended, is that final step—the one piece necessary to complete the solution.

This particular proposal has merit because, of all the proposals examined by the committee, it is the least intrusive—the one that is least disruptive of the fragile process of administering elections in the tens of thousands of jurisdictions across the country that perform the difficult, expensive, crucial, remarkable work of conducting our elections year after year.

Our country is so large, and there is so much variety among the States in how they conduct elections that, going into the hearings, few members of the committee would have believed a solution could be found in which fully three-fourths of the States would change by a maximum of 1 hour.

And yet, while this proposal makes relatively modest changes in most States, it is a complete solution: one that will achieve uniformity: one that will solve the problem.

I commend H.R. 3525, as amended, to the House and urge all my colleagues to support it.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the esteemed ranking member of the Committee on House Administration, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, when this bill passed the Committee on House Administration under the skillful management of the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SWIFT] and the distinguished ranking member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS], I opposed this bill very strongly.

My judgment of this bill is that it is tinkering for the amusement of the managers of the bill to no good purpose whatsoever.

If I understand the rationale of the managers of the bill, and I may be imperfect in my understanding, it is that they want to change the times of poll openings and closings in many of the States because they are afraid that early resignations by candidates or early announcement of poll closing in other States will discourage voters in the Far West.

That is an interesting supposition. However, the fact has never been proved that voters in the Far West do not vote once they have heard election returns in the East. That is point one.

Point two is that we have no guarantee that Presidential candidates will not concede early. None of them have said they would do so. If they do, the same discouragement could of course take place.

It is also true that the chairman of the subcommittee, the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. SWIFT] said that this will achieve uniformity. It will not, of course.

The two worst cases, as far as westernmost States are concerned, are Alaska and Hawaii. The bill exempts those two States. That is how it achieves uniformity. It simply waives them out of the Union and says that the Continental United States will be uniform. But the managers of the bill do not care if people in Alaska or Hawaii are discouraged.

There is no credible research that would back up the statement that people were discouraged in California or Washington. The subcommittee heard 10 witnesses from Washington and California, who presented anecdotal evidence that made new people who were in line that did not vote. Again, anecdotal evidence is worth exactly what it is described as being.

The managers tell us also that they have promises from the networks not to do any early polling until the polls in each State, in the State on which they report, have closed. That is very interesting, but those are not affidavits. They are not signed by the board of directors—managements change; conditions change. In my judgment until those statements are filed with the FEC or some responsible body, there is no reason to pass a law that forces States to do things the States would prefer not to do.

Mr. Chairman, I would be opposed to this bill in any instance because it forces the States of these United States to do things that those States do not want to do. The managers of this bill have told us that many States approve it. Some do. Most of those who approve it are not going to be subject to change, but if you take the States that are going to have to make changes, the disapproval rate is almost unanimous.

□ 1555

My own poll of State election officers shows 24 States opposed, 23 in favor. Clearly, that is no consensus. There is a slight majority opposed to the bill.

Most of those polling against it are those whose States must make changes in their closing hours.

What are those changes? The polls are going to have to stay open longer. They are going to have to train additional judges, or they are going to have to make judges work longer. In many States these judges are elderly and retired people who do not want to work longer hours. The States do not want to pay any more than they are paying now. It is difficult, under current conditions to get people to come at all.

What this bill says is the thing that Congress used to say frequently in the 1960's, less frequently in the 1970's, and almost never in the 1980's; that is, that Congress knows better than States how to run the affairs of the States. I did not believe it in the 1960's, and I don't believe it now.

I believe in Indiana where the State decided it would close its polls at 6 p.m., it did so for a good reason. It knew what its people wanted and how its people would vote best.

In other States where they want to stay open longer, the States do so, and seem to get along with it very well. In this bill, we are doing social tinkering with the most precious right of the American people, that is, the election franchise. In order to satisfy a few people on the west coast, we are going to change radically the closing times of many of our other States, and in some cases, in the extreme cases, which are Indiana and Kentucky, there will be a change in the voting hours by as many as 2 to 3 hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] has expired.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes additional to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding further.

Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, the voting hours will be increased by as many as 2 to 3 hours, 2 hours in Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, Vermont, Florida, and Mississippi; increasing by 1 hour in another 15 or so States. Those States did not want to have that burden laid on them. They are right.

When we are in the full House, Mr. Chairman, I shall ask to make a part of this RECORD letters which I have, and a resolution, from a large number of State election officials asking that the Congress not go through with this folly, not force this way of voting down their throats, not amend State laws at the whimsey of Congress. Those letters and resolution follow:

STATE OF MAINE,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Augusta, ME, January 24, 1986.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
Longworth Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE FRENZEL: Good luck in your attempt to derail H.R. 3525.

Uniform poll closing times, in my opinion, are a bad idea and are responding to an elitest view of what is "good for the people". In addition, it would impose a hardship in terms of our polling hours, especially, if indeed we would have to remain open until late in the evening.

Our current law requires polls to be closed at 8 p.m. A delay in this time by one hour will have several unfortunate consequences. First, it will create different closing times for Federal and nonfederal elections. Essentially this will mean that local elections and State referendum elections will have closing times of 8 p.m. rather than 9 p.m. This will undoubtedly cause confusion among voters and may result in some people not voting since they erroneously think the polls will stay open later.

In addition, the later closing time will require election workers to work later into the evening to compile the results. Since many of the same work throughout election day, increased fatigue, especially in heavy turnout presidential elections, will result in more counting errors. These errors are likely to produce an increased number of election recounts which will be an unfortunate burden and cost to the candidates and administrators. Of course, the cost of election day itself will increase by many thousands of dollars to pay election personnel and those indirectly involved such as custodial and law enforcement staff. Finally, the people of Maine will have to wait until the wee hours of the night to receive election results through news media reporting while those in the West should have their results by late evening. Confusion, error, cost and inconvenience would be the fruits of such a Federal mandated policy.

A few more comments on the motivation behind this effort. While I agree that the impact of news concerning voting behavior in the East affects the decision of many voters in the West about whether to vote, I do not believe that this information should be restricted. Advocates of such restrictions apparently believe that the western voters will not make the "right" decision about whether to vote, go fishing or read a good book. I personally resent the Government, or a "voluntary"' effort by the great communication companies, withholding information on any matters except on a true national security basis.

There is a "foot-in-the-door" aspect of this that also appears dangerous to me. The highly scientific and accurate national public opinion polls are probably a better source about the outcome of an election than are the disjointed "projections" of the national television networks. Will these polls also be blacked out days or weeks before an election?

Even more outrageous, these reports, projections or polling results are only educated opinions about the results of an election. Are we going to restrict not only information but opinion as well?

In summary, this attempt to manage public information is misguided, unnecessary, an infringement on the citizens right to know and an undue burden on election administration in the East.

Sincerely,

JAMES S. HENDERSON,
Deputy Secretary of State.

December 26, 1985.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
U.S. Representative, House of Representatives, 1026 Longworth Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. FRENZEL: Thank you for your letter of December 19. Like you, I strongly oppose H.R. 3525, the Uniform Poll Closing Bill. I appreciate your leadership in trying to prevent its enactment.

I'm enclosing the testimony I submitted to the Subcommittee and a copy of my letter to Congressman Jeffords, which outlines some of my concerns.

Vermont relies principally on paper ballots, and it's often well after midnight before some of the larger towns complete their counting on election night. An extra two hours of voting time will extend that period even further into the wee hours of the morning and result in more exhaustion, confusion, and error.

One argument I have not advanced yet is a practical one. Vermonters are very independent and often contrary, and I would predict that if this legislation is enacted, many towns in the State will simply refuse to comply. I encountered this several years ago when the State required that the polls stay open until 7:00 p.m. for all Australian ballot elections, and I was surprised to find some towns, in the case of our last two Presidential Primaries (which incidentally many people oppose), simply shut down when they felt like it. Imagine the resulting challenges and litigation when presidential candidates find out that the polls did not stay open until the appropriate hour in some cases.

There will certainly be a financial impact on our municipalities, already overburdened by the loss of revenue sharing and increased costs. I also think it will be difficult to recruit poll workers on a weekday evening to stay any later than they already do.

I believe that the only answer to the problem of early projections is for the networks to recognize their responsibilities not to interfere with the sanctity of the voting booth and stop doing it.

Thanks again for your efforts on behalf of those of us out here in the trenches.

Best wishes.

Sincerely,

JAMES H. DOUGLAS,
Secretary of State.

MAY 21, 1985.

Hon. JAMES M. JEFFORDS,
House of Representatives,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR JIM: The papers lead me to believe that several proposals to establish uniform polling hours throughout the country are now being considered with some seriousness by the Election Subcommittee of the House Administration Committee. I feel compelled to write you my personal opinion of such proposals.

The problem the legislation seeks to remedy is very serious. The major television networks consistently announce their projections of Federal elections, based on exit polls and other statistical data, in advance of the closing hours of West Coast States, in many cases causing people who would otherwise exercise the voting franchise to turn around in their cars and return home rather than participate in an election already determined by other voters. Nothing kills the incentive to vote faster than the thought that your vote won't make any difference.

The uniform polling hour proposals would establish 11:00 p.m., 10:00 p.m. or perhaps 9:00 p.m. on Sundays, as the hours polls would close in the East.

Imagine the impact of this proposal on Vermont elections. Poll workers would be forced to delay the process of beginning to count ballots from the present 7:00 p.m. to the hour they normally complete the process today. Sunrise will become a normal part of the experience of working at the polls; exhaustion and resulting bad counting procedures will become the standard; recounts and contests will increase many fold. As most towns offer a modest compensation to their election workers, the cost to our municipalities will increase.

The proposal doesn't make sense to a state like Vermont where more than three-quarters of all voters vote by paper ballot, where all but a dozen communities need to recruit election workers to sort and count paper ballots, often into the wee hours of the morning.

I have no objection philosophically to a uniform poll closing hour. Our Nation has changed dramatically since the framers of our constitution first designed the democratic system where all voters were on the East Coast and news traveled very slowly. The problem with this concept is its practical effect on Vermont. I would have no objection if all polls in America closed at 7:00 p.m. Eastern Standard time, but I realize that this would have an obvious undesirable effect out West.

I've served for several years on the committee for the National Association of Secretaries of State which has considered a variety of aspects of this problem. We've met several times with network executives and have, very frankly, failed to arrive at a mutually satisfactory approach. I personally continue to believe that the best solution to the problem is voluntary restraint on the part of the national networks.

A proposal now pending before the House would have a serious adverse effect on the procedures for conducting elections in Vermont, and I hope you will seek a more satisfactory solution.

Thank you and best wishes.

Sincerely,

JAMES H. DOUGLAS.

UNIFORM POLLING HOURS TESTIMONY OF HON. JAMES H. DOUGLAS, VERMONT SECRETARY OF STATE BEFORE THE U.S. HOUSE SUBCOMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS

The question of how to prevent the news of election results from affecting the results of elections is one that troubles election officials across this country. While the State of Vermont has not seen the loss of turnout due to early reporting of returns that Washington and California have, we all suffer when elections are affected by factors other than the strength of candidates and their positions on the issues. The State of Vermont does have a direct interest, however, in the matter of uniform polling hours, if the "solution" offered to solve a national problem interferes with the conduct of elections in the Green Mountain State.

Vermont elections are conducted principally by volunteers. These devoted citizens usually work from 15 to 20 hours on election day, checking voters in, explaining the voting process, and counting votes from paper ballots by hand until the small hours of the morning. Fully three-quarters of Vermont voters still use paper ballots; only a dozen cities and towns have voting machines, where the tabulating can be done quickly. All polls now close in Vermont at 7:00 p.m., but most election officials seldom finish before midnight, given the need for ensuring an accurate tallying of checklists, count of votes, and completion of returns.

Our experience shows that the longer the time needed for winding up the election, the more likely we will find errors and mistakes in the final outcome. This is not intended to be a negative reflection on Vermont pollworkers, but rather a realistic assessment of the limits of human stamina. Election officials do an incredible job, with very few problems, but if you saddle them with two or three more hours of work before the polls close, you are asking the impossible from them.

Consider also the fiscal impact on cities and towns. At a time when the property tax has been stretched to the limit to pay for necessary local services such as education, longer hours of voting will force municipalities to pay more for poll workers, thus straining local resources even further.

The problem that gives rise to the proposal to establish uniform polling hours originates with the news media, principally the national news networks. It is their competition to be first with the announcement of who has won an election that has made victims of voters in the West and that now threatens to disturb the well-oiled election process we have developed in other parts of the country through this ill-advised federalization of the election process.

Article I, Section 4 of the Constitution of the United States guarantees the right of the states to prescribe the times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives. While that section reserves a residual right of Congress to make or alter such regulations, it seems clear that the purpose of this residual right was to reserve to the federal government "a right to interpose, whenever extraordinary circumstances might render that interposition necessary to its safety." Hamilton, Federalist 59.

Here is no national emergency caused by the states, but a problem caused by the media. Here is a bitter medicine being forced down the throats of the states, when the disease is manifest in the behavior of television reporters. The medicine is worse than bitter: it may well cause as great harm to existing election systems as the ill it seeks to cure.

What price must we pay to protect the award given to the network that breaks the news first?

We do not object to solutions to the problem which leave our system intact. We do object to proposals which will set the closing hours of polls in the East at hours later or earlier than 7:00 p.m. Earlier closing hours will disenfranchise working people who traditionally vote on the way home from their place of business. Later closing hours will affect the reliability of the vote counting process.

We can only hope that Congress will make no precipitous decisions until all alternatives have been explored and all the consequences of their actions have been considered. Elections are delicate mechanisms, easily damaged by slight changes in routine. Please remember this, before making the lives of dedicated election officials more difficult by a uniform poll closing bill such as that proposed by Mr. Guarini.

Thank you.

JANUARY 8, 1986.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
Longworth Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FRENZEL: I read with interest your letter concerning H.R. 3525, the Uniform Poll Closing Bill. I wish to state that while I agree with the theory of uniform closing so as not to discourage voting, some provisions of this Bill would pose problems in Mississippi.

In June of 1984, Dick Molpus, the Secretary of State, appointed a twenty-five member Task Force to study and evaluate the present election laws. As a result, an election bill will be introduced during the 1986 Legislative session calling for a comprehensive revision of these statutes. One of the recommendations of the Task Force was the extension of polling hours. At the present time, the polls open at 7:00 a.m. and close at 6:00 p.m. After considerable study, the Task Force recommended an extension of one hour to the closing time or 7:00 p.m.

To be more specific, Mississippi, has approximately 49 counties utilizing paper ballots. After the polls close in these counties, poll workers must hand tally the votes. They are paid $40 per day for their services. The consensus of the Task Force was not to recommend that the polls remain open longer than twelve hours. Certainly, an increase in polling hours would necessitate a salary increase.

Also for your information, Mississippi is governed by the provisions of the Voting Rights Act. The United States Justice Department will have to approve any change to amend our present election statutes.

In conclusion, thank you for giving me the chance to respond to this matter. I am hopeful that my letter will give you insight into the voting procedures of this State. I will follow with interest the progress of this Bill.

Sincerely,

NANCY SULSER,
Special Projects Officer.

DECEMBER 31, 1985.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
Longworth Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FRENZEL: I appreciate your letter of December 19, 1985 concerning uniform poll closing in Presidential Elections. I, too, have concerns with this legislation since it is an intrusion into the state's ability to run elections.

Currently in Virginia, polls open at 6:00 a.m. and close at 7:00 p.m. The officers of elections are already working very long hours and extending the close of the polls by two hours I believe is an undue hardship. In many cases it means the results would not be complete until well after midnight. That, I am afraid, would lead to many more errors in the tabulation of results.

As to changes in state law, I am not sure how Virginia's General Assembly will address the additional hours. They have several options:

1. Do nothing and require the officers to serve longer hours.
2. Open polls later in the morning.
3. Develop shifts for officers to serve which would require additional personnel.

If I can answer further questions or assist you in any other way in this matter, please contact me.

Sincerely,

SUSAN H. FITZ-HUGH,
Secretary.

DECEMBER 27, 1985.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FRENZEL: Thank you for your letter of December 19, 1985, regarding H.R. 3525, the Uniform Poll Closing Bill.

I agree with your evaluation of the bill and the lack of effect it will have on increased voter participation. Utah's polls are presently open from 7:00 a.m. until 8:00 p.m. on election day. H.R. 3525 would close our polls one hour earlier, which would have a greater negative impact on voter participation than would any media information regarding vote trends from the east.

Election procedure has traditionally been a state responsibility. Utah has a history of being one of the leaders in voter participation. Our elections have also been fair and lacking in fraud. We feel that H.R. 3525 would be an unnecessary infringement on our right and responsibility to conduct elections in a way that provides the greatest benefit to our people.

We hope that when this bill is brought up for discussion it will be soundly defeated.

Sincerely,

DAVE HANSEN,
Deputy Lieutenant Governor.

OCTOBER 25, 1985.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
Hon. BILL THOMAS,
Committee on House Administration, Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVES FRENZEL AND THOMAS: Thank you for the opportunity to comment on election proposals currently being considered by the Subcommittee on Elections of the House Administration Committee. I am sorry for the delay in answering your inquiry; however, I have been in the hospital and only recently returned to my office.

Enclosed is the completed questionaire which you requested comments concerning. In addition, based upon my experience in elections as director of the State Election Commission for the past 20 years, I should like to make a suggestion to your committee for a solution to the problem we are experiencing in the times the polls close on the east coast in presidential and vice presidential elections. It would cause a great deal of disruption, additional work and expenses to the states on the east coast to require them to work additional hours on election day or to change the voting hours to open later and close later in the election day although the actual working hours are not increased. It would seem to me that a more workable solution to this problem would be a federal statute that would prohibit any election official, federal, state or local, from disclosing or making publicly known the results of the vote for president and vice president until the polls close in the western portion of the United States. This would permit election officials in the east to maintain the same voting hours; to go ahead and begin counting the ballots for president and vice president; but it would prevent them, by law, from publicly disclosing these results to anyone, including the media, until such time as the polls close in all other States.

If you or your committee would like to discuss this matter with me further, I would be happy to meet with you.

Yours very truly,

JAMES B. ELLISOR,
Executive Director.

QUESTIONNAIRE

Please complete and return to: Hon. Bill Frenzel and Hon. Bill Thomas, Committee on House Administration, H-326 The Capitol, Washington, D.C. 20515

1. Please list the number of officials required by state law to work in each precinct on election day. What is the amount of compensation for each official?

Three officials for each 500 registered voters or portion thereof in each precinct. For example, if there are 650 registered voters in a precinct, the law requires six officials. Each official receives a minimum of $50 for the election.

2. Would any of the bill require additional poll workers in your state? If yes, approximately how many more. Would there be a problem to recruit the additional poll workers?

Longer hours would require additional poll workers and it would be difficult in some areas to recruit additional poll workers.

3. Would any of the proposals require different locations for precinct polling places?

Possibly so, but not to any great extent with the exception of Sunday voting. We use many churches in South Carolina as voting places and they would be unavailable on Sundays.

4. Based on your own local circumstances, would you recommend that Congress pass any of the following bills?

A. Twenty-four hour voting: Yes—No X.

B. Sunday voting: Yes—No X.

C. Opening and closing times set by Federal Election Commission: Yes—No X.

D. Uniform closing times—1. What hour would be best for you?—p.m.: Yes—No X.

Name: James B. Ellisor.

State: South Carolina.

MICHIGAN DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
SECRETARY OF STATE,
Lansing, MI, October 10, 1985.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
Hon. BILL THOMAS,
Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMEN FRENZEL AND THOMAS: Secretary of State Richard Austin is concerned with the effect of the early release and projection of presidential election returns and believes that this significant problem rightfully deserves the attention of the Congress. Mr. Austin has asked me to convey to you his concerns on this issue and on the legislative proposals now being considered.

I have three concerns with the proposed uniform poll closing changes that would result in Michigan from the legislation enclosed with your letter. (Currently, Michigan's polls open at 7 a.m. and close at 8 p.m. E.S.T.) First, the extension of Michigan's polling period by even two hours would mean that Michigan communities would have to pay election day workers approximately $250,000.00 in additional wages. This additional cost burden could not be justified unless it could be demonstrated that the two or three hour polling period extension would result in an increase in voter turnout levels. Secondly, by shifting the opening of Michigan's polls to 8 a.m., one of the busiest voting hours in the state would be lost (7 a.m. to 8 a.m.). Finally, an 11: p.m. poll closing would mean that the majority of Michigan's percinct workers would not complete their end-of-day duties until 1 a.m. and in some cases, 2 a.m. I view this as an extremely late hour for precinct workers who have reported for duty at 6:30 a.m. During the final hours of the day, when highly detailed precinct reports must be completed, fatique would be great—increasing the chance for inaccuracies in the reports. Clearly a second shift of precinct workers would have to be brought in to cover the latter half of an 18 to 19 hour day. I question whether many of our local clerks are prepared to cope with a sudden doubling of their precinct staffing needs, a significant increase in costs and training and a more difficult recruiting task.

A further concern is that the proposed legislation does not compel the media to withhold election projections until the polls are closed. While I understand that most of the networks have agreed to withhold projections as long as all of the networks adhere to the agreement, the recent and continuing proliferation of new networks (CNN, Metro Media) reduces the likelihood that an agreement of this sort would work in actual practice. With the competition between television networks as keen as it is—and exit polling techniques becoming increasingly more sophisticated—it is probable that the contest to see who can call the election first would continue even with uniform national polling hours and a nonbinding agreement between the networks in place. At a minimum, the legislation should reference the agreements with the networks and automatically release all states from uniform hours if and when the networks violate the agreement.

In summary, while I am anxious to help work toward a solution to the problem presented by the early projection of presidential election results, I feel that alternative solutions to the problem should be explored. Two possible solutions that would not be disruptive to polling hours currently in place across the country would be a federal prohibition enforced by the Federal Communications Commission against the broadcast of election returns before 10 or 11 p.m. or a requirement that television networks blackout projections in a time zone until the polls close in the region.

I thank you for giving me the opportunity to offer my comments on this issue.

Sincerely,

CHRISTOPHER M. THOMAS,
Director of Elections.

QUESTIONNAIRE

Please complete and return to: Hon. Bill Frenzel and Hon. Bill Thomas, Committee on House Administration, H-326, The Capitol, Washington, D.C. 20515

1. Please list the number of officials required by state law to work in each precinct on election day. What is the amount of compensation for each official?

Michigan election law requires that three (3) precinct inspectors be appointed to each precinct. Punch card voting systems require four (4) precinct inspectors. Generally, precinct inspectors are paid between $50-$80 per day.

2. Would any of the bill require additional poll workers in your state? If yes, approximately how many more? Would there be a problem to recruit the additional poll workers?

H.R. 348, H.R. 622, H.R. 640, and H.R. 1759 will require additional precinct inspectors. The election work day now is 6:30 a.m. to midnight. Any additional time requirement will require a split shift—doubling the number of workers. it would not be feasible to pay less than $50 even on a split shift and still recruit sufficient number of workers. Our cost would double. Recruitment is a problem now and these bills would definitely increase the problem.

3. Would any of the proposals require different locations for precinct polling places?

No.

4. Based on your own local circumstances, would you recommend that Congress pass any of the following bills?

A. Twenty-four hour voting: Yes—; No X.

B. Sunday voting: Yes—; No X.

C. Opening and closing times set by Federal Election Commission: Yes—; No X.

D. Uniform closing times—1. What hour would be best for you? 9 p.m.

STATE OF MISSOURI,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
Jefferson City, MO, January 3, 1986.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
Member of Congress,
Longworth Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FRENZEL. Thank you for your letter of December 19 updating me on the status of the House vote on H.R. 3525. As you know, I have gone on record in opposition to Uniform Poll Closing. Primarily, I do not believe it should be the role of the federal government to set a closing time for elections involving state and local as well as federal candidates. I have several other points of concern which I will outline for you. For your convenience, I have also enclosed a letter I sent to members of the House Elections Subcommittee and the Senate Rules Committee, as well as members of the Missouri delegation, in October.

Your letter mentions cost as a concern when considering uniform poll closing. Certainly, cost is a major concern. Additional time at the polls means, at the very least, increasing costs in terms of pay to pollworkers. But, because of pollworker fatigue, we might be forced to add workers, which would certainly add to the expense. Recruitment of pollworkers would most likely be made more difficult with the longer hours. And, we must bear in mind that local jurisdictions must pay these added costs. I don't need to tell you that many of these jurisdictions cannot shoulder any more financial burden.

I think uniform poll closing, and certainly the bill now being considered is confusing to voters. We could conceivably have "national election voting times" and "non-national election voting times," leaving the voter to figure out when he can exercise his right to vote based on what's on the ballot. I am also told the extension of Daylight Savings Time to accommodate the uniform poll closing could also have a substantial negative impact on our transportation systems.

Finally, I have serious questions about changing our national system of elections based on what the national news media may or may not do. While the top executives now in control may pledge one thing, they might not hold their current positions in 1988. The news executives at that time could have completely different thoughts on election coverage.

Congressman, I appreciate your interest in my opinion on this matter. If I may be of further assistance to you as you continue your deliberations, don't hesitate to contact me.

Sincere regards,

ROY BLUNT,
Secretary of State.

STATE OF MISSOURI,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
Jefferson City, MO, October 10, 1985.

DEAR ———: As Missouri's Secretary of State, I would like to officially voice my opposition to federally mandated uniform poll closing. I have several reasons for taking this position and will highlight them in this letter.

First, I do not believe it should be the role of the federal government to set a uniform closing time for elections that involve state and local, as well as federal candidates. Currently, states have varied polling hours in place to serve the needs of their voters. For instance, in Missouri there are seven possible election dates each year on which state or local elections may be held. The polls open at 6:00 a.m. and close at 7:00 p.m. In my opinion, adjusting those election times to accomodate federal elections sharing only certain election dates would be a needless and confusing intrusion into the process of voting.

As you know, a large percentage of the public has not been voting. In Missouri, election authorities have launched various efforts to reduce voter apathy and encourage the electorate to vote. With uniform poll closing, we would be forced to make a decision: Would we change polling times on all elections to create a uniform system or would we simply have "federal election voting times" for those elections held in November of even-numbered years and "state and local election voting times" for the great majority of elections? Either way, I think we would confuse voters and possibly discourage some we have worked hard to involve because polling hours could be inconsistent.

Secondly, I feel uniform poll closing would be a costly proposition. Each additional hour we add to the voting day adds thousands of dollars to local election costs. These costs are, of course, borne by local jurisdictions, many of which are ill-equipped to shoulder any more financial burden. The recruitment of local "election judges" is already difficult in Missouri. Longer hours would almost certainly make a difficult situation worse.

Finally, I am not enthusiastic about the re-structuring of the local election hours in response to new techniques used by the national news media. The election process is, after all, public business. Certainly, we recognize the important functions of the news media, and I agree that they must have proper access for coverage. But I do not believe a national uniform poll closing is an appropriate solution to the problems brought on by early projections and the broadcasting of polling results.

I believe that changing our national system of elections in response to pledges of the current managing executives of the national news networks causes more problems than it solves. Two one-sided Presidential elections combined with the advent of "exit" polling and sampling have made the problem of early projections appear to be greater than it probably will turn out to be. Information technology changes, projections based on demographic data become more refined, policy makers for the national networks change in ways that require us to make decisions based on circumstances that will probably change by the next election.

I think the idea of federally mandated uniform poll closing creates more problems than it solves and in all probability will not solve the problem that occurred in 1980 and 1984. As Secretary of State of Missouri, I oppose this legislation.

I would be glad to discuss this with you or any member of your staff at any time.

Respectively submitted,

ROY BLUNT,
Secretary of State.

STATE OF TEXAS,
SECRETARY OF STATE,
Austin, Texas, October 1, 1985.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
Hon. BILL THOMAS,
Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMEN FRENZEL AND THOMAS: Enclosed is my reponse to your recent questionnaire. I hope this information is helpful.

Secretary of State,
State of Texas.

1. Section 32.031 of the Texas Election Code requires the appointment of a presiding judge and an alternate for each precinct. In addition, House Bill 123 of the 69th Legislature requires the presiding judge to appoint at least one clerk. Since the alternative judge may serve as a clerk, the theoretical minimum is two workers per polling place. As a practical matter, however, only the smallest precincts could function with the minimum staff. Almost every precinct, especially in the general election, employs well in excess of this minimum.

Section 32.091 of the Texas Election Code provides for compensation to be set by the commisisoners of each county up to a maximum compensation of $5.00 per hour. In the general election, this maximum is almost universally the amount actually paid.

2. Any bill which extends the hours during which the polls are open will result in the need to compensate judges and clerks during the extra hours. However, extra personnel would not be necessary. A more important consideration may be the reluctance of some poll workers to work very late hours. Many poll workers are women and most of the more than 6,000 polling places in Texas are located in urban areas. It is reasonable to expect that, since working extended hours at the polls would require them to be out several hours after dark, this might discourage otherwise interested workers from volunteering to serve. It is always difficult to recruit polling place workers, and this may add to the difficulty.

3. Polling places are often located in privately owned buildings. In some cases, owners may consider the later closing time in deciding whether to permit use of their property for a polling place. The extent of such a problem, if any, is not possible to ascertain.

4.A. No.

4.B. No. Since many polling places are now located in churches, this would result in extreme difficulty in locating polling places.

4.C. No.

4.D. No. The real problem is due to the efficiency of exit polling and the geographical reality of multiple time zones. Results of presidential elections will remain predictable before the polls are closed unless the press practices restraint in reporting the results of exit polls.

Uniform poll closing is unlikely to change the voting habits of the public. Most people in the east will have voted before those in the west regardless of the voting hours, and the results of the exit polls will have a disproportionate effect (to the extent they have an effect at all) on the westernmost states.

STATE OF OHIO,
SECRETARY OF STATE,
Columbus, OH, December 23, 1985.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
U.S. Representative,
Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE FRENZEL: I am writing to you regarding House Resolution 3525, the uniform poll closing bill.

I oppose uniform poll closing because it misses the underlying cause of the problem—the television networks. Networks insist on disrupting our electoral system so that they can increase their ratings with exit polls and victory projections. Clearly, it is a case of creating news rather than reporting it. And, as you noted in your dissenting report, there is nothing to prevent the networks from breaking their pledge of withholding results until the polls have closed in the particular state.

As Ohio's Chief Elections Officer, I share your concern over the confusion that would be raised by having one set of longer hours for presidential elections and another set of shorter hours for years with local and state elections. In non-presidential years, voters would be coming to the polls late only to find them closed.

And, as you noted, these changes in voting hours would create expensive administrative problems for many states. In Ohio, more money would be needed for poll workers training and for poll worker wages. It might also require split shifts for Ohio's 13,508 precincts. In addition, adding poll workers could increase difficulty in tracking any inaccuracies that might occur.

I wholeheartedly agree with your arguments and share your concern that this bill misses the real problem. Instead of the states bailing out the networks, national television networks should shoulder the responsibilities that come with the rights of a free press.

If I can provide you with any supporting information in your fight against this bill, please let me know.

Very truly yours,

SHERROD BROWN,
Ohio Secretary of State.

STATE OF KANSAS CAPITOL
TOPEKA, KS, JANUARY 2, 1986.

Congressman BILL FRENZEL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FRENZEL: Thank you for your letter dated December 19 1985 requesting my comments on H.R. 3525.

I am not in favor of H.R. 3525. There are no proven advantages to a Uniform Poll Closing law, therefore a bill of this magnitude should not be passed based upon pure speculation.

The passage of H.R. 3525 would result in higher cost to county and state governments. Office staff and board workers would need to be paid overtime for the extra hours worked. Expenses for utilities and rental of polling places and courthouses would increase. Furthermore, the possibility exists that higher wages would need to be paid to entice board workers to work longer hours.

There is no solid evidence that H.R. 3525 will increase voter turnout. Moreover, modern technology allows networks to make projections as early as 8:00 a.m. election day. The ability to make early projections undercuts any substance H.R. 3525 might have.

I do not believe the Uniform Poll Closing bill offers a solution to voter turn-out or the broadcasting of race projections, or efficiency in administering elections. Thus, the cost is not warranted. H.R. 3525 should not be passed based upon theory. Too much is at stake for a bill of this magnitude to be passed without solid evidence as to its value. Should you have any questions please feel free to contact me in the future.

With every good wish.

Cordially,

JACK H. BRIER,
Secretary of State.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OK
December 26, 1985.

Representative Bill Frenzel,
1026 Longworth Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE FRENZEL:

Thank you for requesting my input concerning the ramifications of H.R. 3525 on Oklahoma election administration.

Oklahoma law now requires that polling places be open from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. If H.R. 3525 were to become law, I presume that the Legislature would change the closing time to 8 p.m. for Presidential elections, so that voters who arrived at the polls between 7 p.m. and 8 p.m. would receive not just federal ballots—as would be required by H.R. 3525—but state and county ballots as well. I do not anticipate significant changes in terms of increased personnel or costs. As I am sure you are aware, it is becoming increasingly difficult to retain the services of qualified poll workers. H.R. 3525 would act to exacerbate that problem by adding additional time to an already-long day for these election officials.

If I may be of further service to you, please let me know.

Sincerely,

LEE SLATER,
Secretary, State Election Board.

STATE OF INDIANA
Indianapolis, IN, January 6, 1986.

Re Uniform poll closing. Presidential elections, legislative proposal.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
United States Congressman, 1026 Longworth Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE FRENZEL: I am writing in response to your letter of December 19, 1985, inquiring as to my thoughts on the Uniform Poll Closing Bill (H.R. 3525) to be considered by the U.S. House of Representatives at the end of January. Although well intentioned, I believe the concept of uniform poll closings is ill conceived.

One lesson recently learned from our state's famed 8th District congressional controversy is that it is difficult to commit citizens to serve on an election board for the 12-hour period during which the polls are open. If Congress were to extend the hours of our voting process beyond the present 12-hour period, I fear that the election process would suffer from an unwillingness of people to work the polling places for the extended three hours.

If two shifts of workers were utilized, costs of administering elections would increase dramatically. Again, under present circumstances, it is difficult to obtain the necessary workers to perform election tasks for a single 12-hour shift. It would be practically impossible to recruit, train and enlist the services of sufficient numbers of people to work through two shifts of a 15-hour election day.

Advocates of the proposal argue that despite all of the problems which can be assigned to the proposal, such problems would only arise on one election day every four years. My response is that Indiana would, of necessity, extend and lengthen the polling times for all elections if they did so for general election day in the presidential year. Otherwise, voters would have an extended day in presidential years, but in the primary and general elections in other years of the four-year cycle, the state would operate within the traditional 12-hour timeframe.

What's the result? Total confusion. Scores of people will converge on polling places at 7:00 or 8:00 in the evening expecting to vote as they did in the most recent presidential election . . . only to find the polling place closed.

There are other, more technical problems inherent in this Congressional proposal. I have, however, touched on the overriding concerns which support my belief that the uniform poll closing concept is bad public policy. It would contribute nothing to either the sound administration of elections in the country or public confidence in the process.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak to this subject. I know that you, too, are opposed to this concept and I hope that my comments will be of assistance in your efforts to defeat it.

Sincerely,

EDWIN J. SIMCOX,
Secretary of State.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA,
CHARLESTON, WV,
January 7, 1986.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR BILL: I have always tried to take a national approach to problems, not wanting to judge the solutions by what seems desirable to a particular state. However, in my position as Secretary of State of West Virginia, I have to look closely at what H.R. 3525, the Uniform Poll Closing Bill, would do to West Virginia elections.

Polls in West Virginia open at 6:30 a.m. Many of the counties are rural and even after the polls close the poll officials are more than a half hour away from the county clerk's office where the ballot boxes must be taken. Also, 30 of our 55 counties still use paper ballots, which must be counted at the polls. In smaller precincts with single election boards, this counting doesn't begin until after the polls close at 7:30 p.m.

County clerks from all over West Virginia have told me they weren't sure if they could run elections with the extended hours. They find it difficult even now to get competent poll officials, many of whom are retired and have difficulty with the long hours as it is.

What disturbs me most is realizing that the Congress is considering putting an additional burden on counties and other election administrators throughout the east, as a result of a problem created by the networks. It would seem to me that there is one way to solve the problem which does not increase the burden on ordinary prople: plainly and simply, work out the problem with the networks.

I realize they are balking at promising to withhold election forecasts until after the polls are closed nationwide, but maybe all the work hasn't been done there that could be done.

The longer day will raise the cost of elections, because we couldn't hope to get poll officials to arrive at the polls for preparation at 5:30 in the morning and stay until well past 9:00 o'clock in the evening, plus any additional counting time, for the current pay of $50 per day. Possibly, we could get by without additional poll clerks, but that would depend on county clerks' ability to find people to work the double shift.

Therefore, I oppose H.R. 3525.

If you ever pass through West Virginia, be sure to put me on your list to visit.

Sincerely,

KEN HECHLER,
Secretary of State.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE, SPRINGFIELD, IL,

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
Member of Congress, 1026 Longworth Building,
Washington, DC 20515

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FRENZEL: Thank you for your letter of December 19 regarding the pending Uniform Poll Closing Bill. I fully agree with the general thrust of your remarks that the Congress should stay out of the business of running elections, which always has been, and should remain, the responsibility of the states. The logic is particularly peculiar in this legislative development. The proponents of H.R. 3525 are saying, in effect, that because the television networks broadcast their election coverage in a manner objectionable to the Congress, the federal government should take over the conduct of elections in presidential election years.

Please understand that these are my personal opinions, and not those of an elections administrator. Since 1974, the conduct of elections in Illinois has been under the jurisdiction of the State Board of Elections, 1020 South Spring Street, Springfield, Illinois 62708. If you are seeking a more expert point of view, I recommend that you consult the Board. However, I thank you for this opportunity to present my views.

Sincerely,

JIM EDGAR,
Secretary of State.

STATE OF COLORADO,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Denver, CO, January 7, 1986.

Hon. TOM FRENZEL,
House of Representatives,
1026 Longworth Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FRENZEL: Thank you for contacting me concerning H.R. 3525, the Uniform Poll Closing bill. I had already written the Colorado delegation and am enclosing copies of the responses received to date.

My concerns as stated to them are first that the problem of early projections and predictions is not resolved by this proposal. Second, that this is an intrusion into the conduct of elections by the states. Let me explain further. The proposed legislation speaks only to presidential election years, yet federal offices are on the general election ballot every two years and projections are made on U.S. Senate and House of Representatives polls in those years. Early projections from polling place interviews may be misleading since voters have indicated to our office that they resent exit polls and do not answer with a true indication of their vote.

When these early projections are broadcast in our state on the voting patterns of eastern states, the time lapse may indicate to the voter that projections have been made from results, not exit polls. In Colorado, general election races at all levels may be decided by a few votes. If electors stay away from the polls because winners of major national races have been projected, no votes are cast for all other races also on the ballot. If close, Colorado requires a recount of the race.

Examples of recent close races are as follows:

Recounts are expensive, with those falling within the statutory mandate of one percent or less of the highest vote cast for a candidate for that office, paid for by the state and counties involved. Colorado law provides for a 100 foot limit on prohibition of electioneering or election-related activities except that of the conduct of the election. (CRS 1-6-101(5) and CRS 1-13-714). Colorado statute 1-13-712(2) and 1-13-718 provide for protection against disclosure of votes and release of information concerning the count. These provisions have worked effectively for a number of elections, with problems resolved quickly and efficiently.

I would encourage other states to adopt similar statutes since exit polling in our state is used only from 7:00 PM until returns come in. It affects no votes since the polls are closed.

To adopt federal legislation, changing time factors will not solve the problem of exit polling from which the projections are made. It may add confusion for those of us administering elections in adjacent time zones. If exit polling projections continue being broadcast before poll closing times, we may feel the effect of lower turn-out and increased recount costs.

Sincerely,

NATALIE MEYER,
Secretary of State.

(1)(a) The boards of county commissioners of the several counties shall divide their respective counties into as many election precincts for all general, primary, and congressional vacancy elections as they may deem expedient for the convenience of the electors of the county and shall designate the place for each precinct at which elections are to be held. The precincts shall be numbered consecutively. The precincts and places of holding elections thus established shall so remain until consolidated, divided, or otherwise changed by each board of county commissioners. (b) In counties which use paper ballots, the boards of county commissioners shall establish at least one precinct for every five hundred active registered electors.

(c) In counties which use voting machines or electronic voting equipment, the boards of county commissioners shall establish at least one precinct for every one thousand active registered electors.

(2) Changes in the boundaries of precincts or the creation of new precincts shall be completed not less than thirty-two days prior to the precinct caucus day, except in cases of precinct changes resulting from changes in county boundaries.

(3) Each board of county commissioners shall change any polling place upon a petition of a majority of the registered electors residing within a precinct if the request is made at least ninety days prior to the primary election.

(4) All changes in precinct boundaries or numbering shall be reported immediately by the county clerk and recorder to the secretary of state, and a corrected precinct map shall be transmitted to the secretary of state as soon as possible after the changes have been effected.

In establishing boundaries pursuant to the provisions of this subsection (6), the board of county commissioners shall take into consideration natural and man-made boundaries that meet the requirements of the United States bureau of the census.

PETITION IN OPPOSITION TO PASSAGE OF THE UNIFORM POLL CLOSING BILL, TO THE HONORABLE MEMBERS, U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 27, 1986

It is with the utmost concern that we voice our opposition to passage of the Uniform Poll Closing Bill, H.R. 3525 which was approved by the House Committee on Administration.

That bill would: (1) establish a uniform time for poll closing in presidential general elections only of 9:00 p.m. Eastern Time; (2) extend Daylight Savings Time until the Sunday after election day every four years in those states in the Pacific time zone; and (3) require polls in the Pacific time zone to close at 7:00 p.m. Daylight Time.

As chief election officials in the various states, we appreciate the interest the federal government has taken in the problems created by the networks' practice of projecting early election returns. We are all in agreement that a situation wherein any voter is discouraged from casting his ballot because the television networks have, for all intents and purposes, announced the results of the election before the polls even close is intolerable.

But consider for a moment the effect this legislation would have if passed. Without getting into the specifics, passage would mean dramatically altering the election laws of 39 states for one election held every four years. Such changes do not come without considerable cost to the states and to local communities already facing financial difficulties. Also, the number of hours polls would be open in some states would have to be changed or cut back, further distorting the voting process.

Moreover, the function of conducting elections is one that rightly belongs to the several states. The fact that federal officials are elected in conjunction with state officials is in the nature of a courtesy and is not an opportunity for federal control.

The most serious consequence of passage is, however, the message it sends to the major television networks in this country. We are telling them, in essence, that while they are responsible for detering large numbers of voters from participating in the election process, they hold such power over us as citizens and as elected officials that we are not able to hold them accountable for their actions. Rather, we have chosen to sidestep the real issue and settle for a "band aid" solution with potentially-serious consequences of its own.

That is not responsible government, and we cannot support such a measure as that sponsored by Representative Swift. We ask that you vote no on H.R. 3525 when it comes before this distinguished body for consideration.

Thank you for your attention.

Jim Waltermire, Secretary of State, Montana; Sherrod Brown, Secretary of State, Ohio; David Hansen, Office of the Lieutenent Governor, Utah; James H. Henderson, Deputy Secretary of State, Maine; Lee Slater, Secretary of State Election Board,, Oklahoma; James B. Ellisor, Executive Director, Election Commission, South Carolina.

James H. Douglas, Secretary of State, Vermont; Alex K. Brock, State Director of Elections, North Carolina; Natalie Meyer, Secretary of State, Colorado; Ken Hechler, Secretary of State, West Virginia; Nancy Sulser, Elections Coordinator, Office of the Secretary of State, Mississippi.

I would also state that the committee report says that CBO estimates it will cost an additional $2 million for State and local election officials. Now for a Congress that spills $2 million before breakfast, that is not a very big sum. For local election officials it may be a back-breaking sum. In my judgment, it is vastly understated.

The CBO estimate does not take into account the additional dollars that are going to be lost to our economy because of daylight saving time on the west coast and its effect on our transportation system.

I hope to have a chance to talk about that later during debate on the bill under the 5-minute rule. I also hope to talk more about the Voting Rights Act. This impinges on the Voting Rights Act, and the enforcement of that act is on a case-by-case basis. Decisions will take a long time and cannot be made in blocks.

The bill has no penalties. If States don't comply, there seems to be no way to make them do so. States may try to comply and find local jurisdictions will not do so.

Again I can only say, Mr. Chairman, there is no reason to legislate, and there is doubly no reason when it means telling the States to do things that they do not want to do for no good reason.

H.R. 3525 is unwise, almost whimsical legislation. It is tilting, or half tilting, a nonexistent windmill. The bill will surely discourage more potential voters than it will encourage.

I urge this body to reject this imprudent bill. Local governments are having enough trouble with federally imposed conditions with no money to pay for them. Let's not do another.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the chairman of the full Committee on House Administration, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO].

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I thank the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SWIFT].

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington, Hon. AL SWIFT, as chairman of House Administration's Subcommittee on Elections, has dedicated hundreds of hours, presided over countless hearings, studiously considered every bill on the subject, pondered each of their provisions, and considered every alternative, before bringing H.R. 3525, the uniform regional poll closing bill, to this floor for our consideration.

The gentleman from California, Hon. BILL THOMAS, as the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Elections, and one of the best and most active members of the Committee on House Administration, has staunchly supported and diligently participated in all of the investigations and studies which brings this matter to our attention.

These two gentlemen, whose energies and efforts are most responsible for the legislation we have before us today, have been extremely sensitive to the conflicting concerns of all those involved—the voters, the election administration officials, the networks, and the candidates themselves—and they have brought to the floor a bill which I feel effectively meets all of those concerns.

Predicting the outcome of an election before all the polls are closed has serious consequences for the democratic processes of our Nation. Having heard projections on the outcome of an election, many voters are discouraged from casting their ballots believing the results have been decided. The effect is the same as if they were disenfranchised.

The process of casting ballots to select political leaders is fundamental to our citizenship in the United States of America. In developing this legislation, it was the objective of the Subcommittee on Elections to maintain the integrity of the electoral process while at the same time protecting the freedom of the media.

H.R. 3525 is a balanced bill designed to protect the election process in conformance with the traditions of our unique and great democracy.

Vote yes and pass this bill. Vote yes and send a message to all of the voters in our Nation that their votes count whenever the polls in the United States are open. Vote yes and improve America's electoral process through this measure.

I support passage of this bill and urge you to do likewise.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to my distinguished colleague from California [Mr. BADHAM], a member of the committee.

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, H.R. 3525, however nobly motivated, or however conceptually appealing, should be characterized as "reform without reason." There should only be one legitimate rationale on which to base Federal invasion of an area traditionally left to each State, and that rationale should be an increase in voter participation.

This bill will not achieve that purpose. In fact, it may accomplish exactly the opposite. Shortening voter hours in a number of States and changing voting hours in most of the States for Presidential general elections only confuse voters.

THE PERCEIVED PROBLEM

Following the 1980 and 1984 landslide Presidential elections, there have been scattered complaints about the impact of early projections of winners by the television networks, and their perceived impact on west coast voters. An early concession by the defeated Presidential candidate was a particular irritant. During each set of hearings conducted by the task force on elections after the 1980 election and the Subcommittee on Elections after the 1984 election, little statistical evidence was brought forward to verify the impact on the west coast.

During both sets of hearings, west coast election officials were virtually unable to present any more than stories of people leaving the polls or that their projected number of voters were less than the actual number of voters which they felt suggested that early projections caused folks to stay home.

Additionally, some proponents cited a University of Michigan study conducted after the 1980 election that suggested turnout dropped 6-11 percent because of projections. However a critique of that study published in a public opinion magazine using the same data indicated that 0.2 percent of all eligible respondents reported that they did not vote because of election night coverage instead of the 6-11-percent figure.

The point of all this, Mr. Chairman, is to suggest to my colleagues that we are considering a so-called reform without a good reason. This bill will change the election hours in 39 States every 4 years for no justifiable reason except that there is a perceived problem in 4½ States.

THE NETWORKS COMMITMENT

After the 1984 election, Congressman SWIFT and Congressman THOMAS met with the networks officials and extracted statements from them that they would no longer "use exit poll date to suggest, through interpretation of that data, the probable winner in any State until polls in the State have closed."

Testimony before the subcommittee indicated some very real concern, which I share, with the scope of that pledge particulary in light of previous pledges made and broken by the networks.

But yet, we are going to change the election laws of 39 States based upon a nonbinding agreement between the current corporate management of the networks. At the very least, we should accept the gentleman from New Hampshire's amendment requiring the renewal of this commitment 90 days before a general election.

IMPACT ON TRANSPORTATION INDUSTRY

One of the provisions of the bill would extend daylight savings time for a maximum of 2 weeks for the 4½ States in the Pacific time zone in Presidential election years. This means that everyone else will be on standard time except for those States.

The Air Transport Association of America indicated in a letter to me that this would result in considerable confusion among passengers and cargo shippers moving goods in interstate commerce, disrupt airline schedules, and cause airlines and related travel industry businesses to incur considerable expense.

The most serious problem is, of course, the disruption of airline schedules because many of them are geared to Pacific time zone departure and arrival times. They would also incur considerable expense to print two complete schedules in a 2-week period. Not to mention loading the schedules into the computer. Additionally, they would have difficulty with crew scheduling and lastly, they would be unable to comply with nighttime noise curfews at not less than four airports.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I have to ask for what reason are we creating this mess? Because of a perceived problem of early projections on the west coast voter.

POLL HOUR CHANGES

H.R. 3525 will require the majority of States to change their polling hours. In eight States: Iowa, portions of South Dakota, Montana, Utah, Idaho, California, Oregon, and Washington will be required to reduce the time polls will be open in their States. One of the more interesting comments from one of the election officials testifying before the subcommittee came from our secretary of state of California who indicated in her written testimony that between 5 and 10 percent of the electorate vote between 7 and 8. However, that wouldn't be a problem because of their liberal absentee voting laws. She was unable to quantify the impact of early projections. I would suggest that anytime there is a change—particularly a reduction in voting hours only every 4 years—it will result in reduced numbers and voter confusion.

Polling hours in 11 States will remain the same: New York, Rhode Island, Louisiana, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Wyoming, and Nevada.

In the balance of the States and the District of Columbia, 31 States will be required to alter their voting hours from a minimum of one-half hour in Arkansas to 2 to 3 hours in Indiana and Kentucky.

Two secretaries of state have indicated to me that this change probably would result in voter confusion and may require them to change the times of all of their elections, not just the Presidential general election.

And again, I will ask my colleagues—for what reason are we requiring States to make these changes?

CONCLUSION

In the 1980 and 1984 Presidential elections, Ronald Reagan was elected and reelected by a landslide electoral college vote. It was possible on both occasions that candidate Reagan had won enough electoral college votes to be declared the winner before polls had closed in all parts of the Nation. If one had watched the evening news the night before the election, they knew the election was not going to be a cliff hanger.

Even though it may be years before that phenomena occurs again, this bill is going to require 39 States to alter their voting hours based on a nonbinding pledge made by three corporate entities in the hope that this will solve some sort of a perceived problem.

State and local governments are responsible for managing elections and paying for their costs. The Congressional Budget Office has indicated this could be at least $2 million. The Federal Government can set standards. It should never interfere in local management of elections unless there is compelling evidence of a need to do so. The committee has presented no such evidence.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I am happy to yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WYDEN].

Mr. WYDEN. I thank the chairman of the subcommittee.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SWIFT] and the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS] for canvassing the country to listen to what the people of this country would believe to be fair, responsible legislation. I think they have done that. They have come up with a responsible bill. The right to vote is the coin of democracy and it seems to me that the early projection of election results is devaluing the currency.

What we are seeing, particularly in the West, is our citizens go to the polls after the winners of an election is announce and because of the early network projections our citizens believe that the votes of those who vote late simply do not count as much as the votes of those who vote early.

Mr. Chairman and colleagues, we have tried a variety of voluntary approaches in this area. For example, in the last Presidential election I asked Mr. Mondale and President Reagan to agree voluntarily to hold off any election announcements until polls closed in the West. They did so, to their credit.

But the networks still announced the results before we were done voting in the West. So it is clear that purely voluntary approaches are not going to deal with this matter.

My last point is that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] has continually said there is no evidence that early election projections discouraged people from voting. I would tell the gentleman that there is evidence right in committee reports. Every single study that has been done in this area indicates that some people are being discouraged.

We can debate how many people, that is, whether it is 3 or 2 percent or what have you. But the evidence is clear, some people are being discouraged.

The other point is that the gentleman from Minnesota has said that there is not a great deal of interest around the country in this legislation. I would just tell the gentleman that in every community that I am acquainted with, when the networks come on the air with an early projection, they continually have their phones ring off the hook from irate citizens who are unhappy about these early projections.

So I would hope that we could pass this legislation to ensure that all citizens have a right to have their votes be seen as counted as equally.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from Nevada, [Mrs. VUCANOVICH], a member of the committee.

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 3525, the uniform regional poll closing bill. This bill will allow polls to close simultaneously across the country only during Presidential elections. I believe this bill will enable all voters to have the opportunity to cast their vote without knowing the outcome of the election beforehand.

In the 1980 election, the outcome of the election was announced before any of the Western States' polls had closed. Many voters did not even vote believing that since the winner of the Presidential election had already been announced, their vote was worthless. While this may not have had much affect on the outcome of the Presidential election, many State and local elections were decided without the benefit of full voter participation.

Earlier this year, the three networks agreed to exercise voluntary restraint in using their exit polling data to determine the outcome of elections. The networks agreed not to use exit polling data or suggest the probable winner until the polls in that State are closed. This agreement solved only half the problem because Western voters could still be subject to actual vote totals declaring a winner before the polls closed. This is why I believe nationwide uniform poll closing will solve this problem.

This legislation allows Americans to retain one of their most precious rights—the right to vote. I believe all Americans, should have the opportunity to cast their ballot and to have their vote count. H.R. 3525 insures that right and I hope my colleagues will support this bill.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOYER].

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the subcommittee for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3525, the uniform poll closing act. The chairman of this committee and subcommittee deserve to be commended for their excellent work and perseverance on this issue.

Primarily, it is an issue of fairness. All voters deserve the right to cast their ballot for the candidate of their choice without the slightest hint of discouragement. Unfortunately, voters in the Western United States have had to confront news reports which predict the outcome of elections before the polls have been closed and all votes cast. Common sense tells us that such a policy diminishes the value of our most important democratic institution—the ballot box, by implying that some votes count more than other votes. In this case, early votes are given a greater weight than later ones. This is unfair to those who through no choice of their own, are 3 hours behind their fellow citizens on the opposite coast.

Mr. Chairman, it might appear that the easiest method for correcting this situation would be to prohibit the media from making such predictions until all polls are closed. This however treads into another treasured right, the freedom of the press, and the subcommittee and its chairman, Representative SWIFT, recognized this conflict early in their deliberations. Undeterred, they successfully crafted a compromise which it appears all parties can abide by. The networks have agreed not to predict probable winners of an election in a State until the polls in that State are closed. Since such a policy is only meaningful if all polls close at the same time, the committee has wisely pursued this legislation. With its passage, the networks will be unable to reveal probable outcomes relying on a few key States while some States' polls are still open.

Mr. Chairman, the root of liberty is the right to vote. Nothing should be allowed which would impugn the integrity of this right. The committee has worked long and hard to develop a workable compromise and now it is the responsibility of the floor to help bring this solution to fruition. I would urge all Members to join me in supporting this proposal and in protecting our most precious American possession, the right to vote.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LUKEN].

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Washington for this time.

Mr. Chairman, I want to very sincerely congratulate the gentleman from Washington and the gentleman from California for their leadership in this matter, because it is a problem that is perceived by many and it is one that they have devoted conscientiously a great deal of time and effort. And they have marshaled a great deal of support for this proposition.

Unfortunately, I cannot fully agree with the sponsors. I do not envy the sponsors. I do not envy them in their attempt to regulate the 48 States in an area that has not been regulated before.

I voted against the sense-of-Congress resolution in 1984, as did 64 other Members, because I believe the arguments are overdrawn. I believe the issues are overblown. I believe what it comes down to is, as has been stated here today, the purely voluntary will not work and, therefore, we are going to an involuntary, a forced kind of approach, and I really do not think that works in an election matter. I do not think it is going to work. I do not think people realize what is coming down the track.

In the State of Ohio, the secretary of state, as many secretaries of state, have urged us to oppose this legislation. The secretary of state of Ohio opposes the legislation because it is going to cause a great deal of expense, more than is estimated for the entire State, because it will probably require two shifts of workers in the State of Ohio. It will require additional expense. It will require, if not two shifts, then 18- and 19-hour shifts, which means that errors will creep in this all-important election system that we have.

If we attempt to regulate from Washington what each State does in the conduct of its elections, there are going to be errors, there are going to be distortions, and I do not envy the sponsors in the product.

Mr. Chairman, I do congratulate them for what they are trying to do, but these are governmental restrictions. These are restrictions in program content, regulations in an area where regulations should not occur. That is the point.

Now, I think the bill has an inherent flaw, as I have stated. I thought that I might improve it by an amendment. But upon further consideration, I would only be restricting the restrictive effect of a bill which regulates too much. Therefore, I really do not think I can improve the legislation.

I am sorry that the conditions are such that the real problems that have arisen in the case of some elections on the west coast have convinced people that we should go to this extreme situation of regulating the 48 States in their conduct of election. But because I do not think it can be improved, I will quietly vote against the legislation, but I will not attempt to offer the amendment which is printed in the RECORD.

Mr. Chairman, again I congratulate the authors for the hearings, for the light that they have shown on it and for an attempt to solve what is a real problem. But I just think that we have gone too far, and so I must demur.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GREGG].

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from California and I thank the Chairman of the committee.

This bill is truly ill conceived, although it is obviously a genuine effort to address a problem which some people in the Western States feel affects their rights and their ability to vote.

It is, however, a bill which has a number of fundamental flaws. The first fundamental flaw is it places faith in promises and in hopes of activities which will be undertaken, first by the people who are running for office. There is nothing to say that a candidate cannot concede his election or her election prior to the closing of the polls in the West. And second, on behalf of the networks a statement from the networks that they will honor this agreement. And I do not think anyone who has watched the network news over the last 2 days at least, when we have watched them in what I consider to be a totally disreputable activity, interviewing children in the second grade about their feelings and their emotions as they watched the shuttle explode, can give much confidence in the order of the networks on the issue of news collection. And certainly we cannot place much faith in their representations, in my opinion.

But more fundamental than our commitment of faith in this bill is our belief in States' rights. The fact is that this bill is a clear usurpation of the rights of local communities and States to govern themselves and decide how they proceed with their most fundamental right, and that is how they elect their officials.

In my own home State, there are many small communities. All of those communities have their own polling hours. They are told only by the State that they must be open to a limited number of hours. I believe it is 6 hours. And they can set those hours as they deem best and their citizens deem best, and it is done by the citizens, not by the Federal Government or by the State telling them how to do it. It is done at a town meeting where all the citizens of the town get together and say, we want our polls open from this time to this time.

In my own hometown, which has 900 people, where there are approximately 250 voters or 300 voters who will vote in an election, it is open from 10 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock in the evening. People vote. Our percentage of voter participation in New Hampshire is extraordinarily high. They know it is their duty to plan their day so that they can vote. They also know that it is their personal duty to return home to their families at night after 6 o'clock and to be with their families.

And to deny that to the poll workers, to say to those poll workers, "You have to be there until 9 o'clock at night because of some arbitrary decision of the Federal Government, that you must stay until 9 o'clock at night," is unfair to them, but, more importantly, it is a usurpation of a very fundamental right in this government, which is the right of the local communities and the States to set their election hours.

The mechanics of handling this bill will be extraordinarily expensive to a State like New Hampshire and many States in the Northeast that do have at this time polls that close throughout the day, because you are talking about forcing those States to keep the polls open for an additional minimum, in some situations, of 3 hours, and longer in other situations, and the cost will be exceptional and it will be a cost that is borne by the local community and it will be a cost that the local community will have a lot of trouble explaining to itself when it was running elections very effectively without having to stay open all evening.

One has to also wonder what happened to Hawaii and Alaska. Are they not part of the Union? Did we decide that Hawaii and Alaska have disappeared simply because they are not part of the continental United States? They are not in this bill. And yet everybody else in the United States is in this bill. That seems to be an inconsistency so fundamental that it flaws the bill to the point where it should be defeated simply on that point.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BIAGGI].

Mr. BIAGGI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise as a cosponsor and supporter of this bill, H.R. 3525, to establish a uniform poll closing time for Presidential general elections. The notion of same-time voting has long appealed to me. In fact, I authored a bill in 1980 providing for same-time voting in Presidential elections and I have been advocating the idea ever since. My support for same-time voting is based on a firm belief that we must do everything possible to overcome controllable obstacles to voting. Quite frankly, the voter turnout rate in our Nation, which is barely 50 percent in Presidential elections, is a disgrace.

I am convinced that there is a direct link between the elimination of early election projections and increased voter turnout. One study, conducted by the University of Michigan, concluded that the early projection in 1980 resulted in a 6- to 11-percent decline in overall voter turnout.

Now, thanks to the deep concern and tireless work of the distinguished chairman of the Elections Subcommittee, Mr. SWIFT, and the ranking minority member, Mr. THOMAS, a sensible and workable solution is before us. They have pressured the major networks into pledging not to make projections based on exit polls until the polling places are closed. If this pledge is coupled with a uniform poll closing time, as proposed in H.R. 3525, the problem of early election projections would be eliminated. That is an objective worth achieving and I urge my colleagues to join me in voting for this very responsible measure.

But, let me add that while this change should help to increase voter turnout, this modest reform must not be the end of our efforts to stimulate voter participation. A more comprehensive plan deserves our priority attention and such reforms as Sunday elections and 24-hour voting should be given serious consideration.

The previous speakers, Mr. Chairman, addressed themselves to the States of Hawaii and Alaska, and we realize they are distinguished because of the location and the time zones involved, and they pose a problem. The committee has dealt with that. And in this case, there is no possible universal legislation that could address the 50 States. But for those two States, the program will not impose any hardship, will not increase any cost. We have had hearings in the past, when most witnesses testified there would be little or no additional cost.

So most of the arguments that have been offered by those who oppose this legislation are specious, at best, when you consider the overall principle of providing an election process that permits every person's vote to be as valuable as the other, whether it be the first or the last.

I strongly urge the passage of this legislation.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this bill. I want to congratulate my colleague, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SWIFT], for his fine work in addressing a very difficult problem.

Mr. Chairman, throughout the history of this Nation, we have battled to preserve the right of every American citizen to cast his or her ballot freely and without any undue interference on election day. The battle started back in the 1700's at the Constitutional Convention. Then in the early 1800's there was a battle against having property rights interfere with voting. And then the battle against having race interfere with voting. And then the battle against having sex interfere with voting.

Well, those were battles against too little knowledge, ignorance, prejudice. Today we have a new obstacle to the right to vote. Instead of knowing too little, today we know too much. New techniques have created a technological global village where there are instant error-free election predictions, where the news media competes with each other to put out the news so that we know instantly across the Nation who is going to win, and the would-be voter on the west coast is very discouraged from voting, from exercising that franchise that we have fought for.

My colleague, who not coincidently is himself a former broadcast journalist, has found a cure for the problem, and it is a cure that is not as bad or worse than the disease. This bill, by extending daylight savings time and modifying poll closings is a thoughful and effective answer to our dilemma.

I believe this bill deserves our support and it continues that fight that started hundreds of years ago to make sure that all of us have a right to vote without interference.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2½ minutes.

Mr. Chairman, a number of points have been raised, and I think when we get to the amending process we will be able to go into these in greater detail, but a number of points have been raised that simply are not true.

First of all, the concern on the west coast and across the country has been characterized as scattered complaints on the west coast. I would point out that, first of all, it was an uproar and not scattered complaints. And, second, I would point out that after the TV Guide ran a series of articles in two editions, they suggested that anyone who is concerned with the problem write our subcommittee, and we received hundreds and hundreds of responses. They came from 49 of the 50 States. And out of all of the responses we have had, only four suggested we should not deal with the problem.

We have heard that there is only anecdotal evidence. Well, there have been a number of studies, and one that has gone so far as to indicate that among people who intended to vote and had not voted by 6 o'clock in 1980, fully 25 percent did not go to the polls.

People quibbled with that. There have been other ones. And you can always quibble with a poll. But what there is consensus on is that you can demonstrate at least a 2-percent drop-off. I do not believe anyone can say in a democratic society that 2 percent of the electorate is de minimis.

The transportation system, that is way overblown. We are talking about problems that may occur during 1 hour of the day at perhaps six airports, and we have looked into it and in each instance that can be taken care of. That is the greatest straw dog of them all.

And, finally, I would like to point out that there has been much said here about the increased cost and that they will have to go too long, in double shifts, and so forth.

One of the things about this proposal is that it does not require of any State to do something that some States do not do now. It requires no State to be open longer than some States do now. It does not require them to stay open later than some States do now. The concerns with double shifting are not legitimate concerns. There will be no need for double shifting because States currently are able to make this work, there is no double shifting anywhere in the 50 States of the United States now, and this bill will not require of any State that kind of an extraordinary effort.

So the points that are being raised are points that I think are being raised because of sincere concern but they are not of accurate concern.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, we are not here because we want to engage in social tinkering. We are not here because we think we know better than the States themselves. Mr. Chairman, we are here because we are trying to deal with technological prowess.

In 1980, it has been charged by one of our former colleagues that the reason we had the problem on the West Coast was because the President went belly up on national TV. In point of fact, there was a network projection that he was to be a loser before he made his announcement.

In 1984, we had both Presidential candidates agree that they would not issue a statement prior to 11 p.m. eastern standard time, and yet almost 3 hours before the polls closed on the west coast, 2 hours before the polls close in mountain States, the announcement was made that the election was over.

What you have in front of you is a work product in H.R. 3525, which is a very modest attempt to deal with this advancing technology in a way in which Congress has the full power to do so.

I would invite any of my colleagues to read briefly article I, section 4 of the Constitution, in which the Congress has the full power to deal with time, place and manner of Federal elections.

When you examine the various alternatives, to try to provide some solution to the problem—and I think, yes, there can be a fundamental disagreement as to whether or not there is a problem—I would say to my colleague from California if he believes the problem is 4½ States, just wait, because by 1988 or by 1990 it could fully be half the States of the Union, and shortly thereafter, because of technological advancements, it will be entirely possible through polling techniques to tell you who won by noon eastern standard time.

What we did was examine those areas, those institutions, those activities surrounding the election process which would have to make changes if we desired to solve what we thought was a problem.

It has been mentioned that the candidates could certainly concede, as President Carter did. We saw in 1984 both Presidential candidates willingly agreeing not to make a statement. They want to be part of the solution, not a part of the problem. I fully believe that whoever the parties nominate in 1988, they will want to be part of the solution and not part of the problem.

For a long time it was argued that the networks were part of the problem, and I fully believe they were, because until they made the flat statement to us that they would not project in any form or characterize an election before the polls in a State closed, it meant we could try to bring before you this kind of a measure and they could through the back door undermine our efforts so we could not even start.

As has been indicated, in January of 1985, the networks agreed that they would not project or characterize elections until the polls had closed in any given State. That meant, then, that they were not any longer a part of the problem.

The problem can be solved by Congress. The candidates are not the problem. The networks are not the problem. The problem is the antiquated election process across the United States which does not allow for a uniform poll closing time. What we are offering you in H.R. 3525 is the minimally intrusive procedure to provide for that uniformity.

In our hearings we heard all kinds of alternatives to the current situation: Sunday voting, 24-hour voting, any number of procedures which would cost far more and which would go far beyond what the gentleman from Washington, the chairman of the subcommittee, and this gentleman would consider as reasonable and appropriate solutions.

So it is a little humorous to me to listen to the objections that are being presented in opposition to this very, very, modest proposal. The gentleman from Minnesota has gone so far as to characterize the FEC as a responsible body. I can tell you if any of you know him, that indicates the lengths to which he has had to go now to find objections to this particular measure.

It might seem a kind of an inelegant solution to fiddle with time zones. I might remind individuals that the time zones that we currently have are creatures of our minds and that we have adjusted them at will. As a matter of fact, we did not even have a uniform daylight saving time across the country until 1966. It amazes me that the airlines and the ground transportation could move across this Nation without, apparently, this procedure that now must remain in place. Fixed immutably in time and that by a simple adjustment of 1 hour on the west coast in terms of the time of ending of daylight savings time, would provide us with an opportunity to provide uniform closing in Presidential elections, seems to me a solution which the Members of this House would leap at when you compare it with possible alternatives in terms of disruptions in the system.

So let me just say to my colleagues who are concerned about this as an alternative: Many, many hours were spent in examining other possible options. This is the most minimal instrusion into the system in a manner which is totally appropriate under the Constitution, and which I think provides an opportunity for us to examine other possible changes in the Election Code which will allow us to stay at least abreast of advancing technology.

So I would say to may colleagues as they contemplate their vote on H.R. 3525, candidates for President have done their job in the past, and I am confident will do their job in the future. The networks have made the commitments necessary for us to bring you this bill today. The only folks left, in terms of whether or not they want to do the job, they want to provide uniform poll closing in Presidential elections, are you, our colleagues, and we have before you a vehicle which will do that if you so choose.

So I would urge you to vote "aye" on H.R. 3525.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WYDEN].

Mr. WYDEN. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me at this time.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to make two points. Three-quarters of the States in this country will be changing their election laws by a maximum of 1 hour to solve a national problem. I think it is clear that that indicates that this can be done with a minimum of inconvenience.

The second point that I would mention is that we continually hear about the airlines being inconvenienced by having to do this once every 4 years. It seems to me that an industry that is capable, almost on the spur of the moment, of putting in place nationwide discount plans and changing all their schedules to reflect these discounts, surely can once every 4 years handle their scheduling to allow for uniform poll closing laws.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Chairman, I would add to what the gentleman has just said. It is also true that the airlines publish their schedules once every 2 weeks anyway, so it adds no additional burden there.

I would like to close debate by making one simple observation. It seems to me that the thrust of the opposition to the legislation goes this way: There is not any problem really, so therefore, we should reject this solution. I think that the vast majority of the American public disagrees with the judgment that there is no problem.

Just today, across my desk, came the results of a study by the Times-Mirror; "People on America's Attitude Toward the Media." It is very interesting and I think somewhat good that we find that in most instances the American public is very concerned about the first amendment when asked: "Should Government require equal access for candidates in newspapers?" Or, "Should the Government not get involved?" The majority of the American people say the Government should not get involved. When asked, "Should Government require all sides receive coverage on controversial issues?" or, "Should the Government not get involved?" The American public says the Government should not get involved. But when asked,

"Should the Government not allow early projections on election night?" or "Should the Government not get involved?" The public says the Government should prevent early projections.

Now, fortunately, we do not have to go that far. The gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS] and I, have no interest whatever and would not support a proposal that involved the Government telling the networks what to do. A clear transgression of the first amendment. But do not tell me the American public does not believe there is a problem here. And do not tell me that the carefully crafted, very restrained proposal that this committee is bringing the Congress today is not one that will solve that problem.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to express my strong support for the uniform poll closing time and commend my colleagues, AL SWIFT and BILL THOMAS, for their leadership in bringing this bill to the floor.

It would have been easy to neglect this issue since the problem arises only once every 4 years, but it is an issue that deserves the attention of Congress because it involves the basic right of our citizens to participate in the electoral process. It is a definite infringement on that right when voters learn the outcome of an election before they have cast their ballots.

H.R. 3525 will eliminate that infringement, and not tamper with the constitutional rights of broadcasters. The uniform poll-closing time, in effect, tells people on the west coast that their votes do count and carry the same impact as those of voters in earlier time zones. In addition, a uniform closing will avoid the possibility that the outcomes of State and local races are affected because people lose some of the incentive to vote once they learn the Presidential results.

I believe the bill before us today is an innovative and workable way to address a problem that is a source of concern for voters not only on the west coast, but those in the Nation as a whole. This proposal accomplishes an important national objective with a minimum of disruption and confusion for voters in all regions of the country.

H.R. 3525 deserves the support of the House, and I urge my colleagues to oppose any weakening amendments.

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to voice my opposition to H.R. 3525 to establish a uniform poll-closing time for Presidential elections. I believe that the problem of people being discouraged from going to the polls by early projections is one that is somewhat exaggerated. While I agree with efforts that are underway to get the networks to discontinue the use of exit polls to make their projections, I feel that if voters intend to vote they will not be swayed by premature speculations and projections. The right to vote is our constitutionally protected voice in our Government and I feel that most Americans cherish this right and would exercise their right regardless of the status of elections.

This bill would also have a negative effect on our polls in West Virginia. The bill would force the polls to remain open until 9 p.m. on the night of the election. Many of our precincts in some of the rural counties vote by paper ballots. Keeping the polls open until 9 p.m. would give them a late start on counting and verifying the ballots, thereby delaying the actual tallying of their votes. Such delays are not needed in West Virginia.

We must also keep in mind the confusion factor which would be raised by a changing of the poll hours. We can tell from experience that confusion or uncertainty over whether or not the polls are open is a very large factor in keeping voters away from the polls. In non-Presidential election years, some voters may still think that the polls would be open until 9 p.m. when, in fact, they would have closed a few hours earlier. Some States would be forced to close their polls at 9 p.m. every year in order to avoid the confusion. Yet, these new hours would serve no purpose in years when there is no Presidential election.

It is for these reasons, Mr. Chairman, that I must oppose this bill and I urge my colleagues to do the same. There are other ways to increase voter turnout.

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Chairman, today I rise in support of H.R. 3525, legislation to establish a standard closing time for Presidential general elections. After a careful investigation of the facts pertaining to this issue, it is clear to me that there have been serious infringements upon our Nation's electoral procedures. The lack of uniform poll closings threatens the backbone of America's democratic tradition. In order to remedy this situation, I have cosponsored this measure so all polls will close simultaneously on Presidential election day.

For the past 25 years the increasing speed and accuracy of network polling has resulted in projections of Federal elections considerably earlier than all votes are cast. While the media strives to report the outcome of a national campaign as soon as polls close in the East, there are nearly 3 hours of balloting left in some Western States. Serious questions have arisen as to how these early projections influence voting decisions and the public's motivatiion to vote.

This problem manifested itself during the Presidential election of 1980 when pollsters predicted President Reagan's victory over Carter well before west coast polls were closed. An in-depth investigation after this event concluded that some voters declined to cast their ballot after hearing media reports of Reagan's landslide. The outcome of some congressional contents were affected as well.

It has been argued that the number of voters influenced by these announcements represents an insignificant minority in a large Presidential campaign. This narrow argument fails to incorporate the larger ramifications which confront the electoral process as a whole. A margin of voters, however narrow, whose political voice is not heard can have a significant effect on any election, especially small, close races. Indeed, there are numerous instances in which the outcome of congressional, gubernatorial and municipal elections have depended upon one-vote margins.

Most importantly, premature projections violate the concept of fairness and equity which is of primary importance in conclusively declaring a candidate the victor. Since the 1980 Presidential campaign, these network "characterizations" of election results have overridden the media's commitment to prepoll closing discretion.

Mr. Chairman, we must ensure that the democratic principles which depend upon a fair and equitable process are not placed second in the network's pursuit to quickly and efficiently report newsworthy events. I urge my colleagues to vote for this timely legislative initiative.

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to speak in favor of H.R. 3525, a bill to establish a uniform poll closing for Presidential general elections.

We live in an information age where news is transmitted with immediacy by communications networks linking every corner of America and the world. But despite our great technological advancements, our Nation is still divided by numerous time zones. This has created a problem on election day when national networks broadcast early projections of winners based upon exit polls conducted in the eastern time zones.

The most infamous incident of this occurred on election day of the 1980 Presidential general election when early forecasts predicted Ronald Reagan the winner over Jimmy Carter. Media reporting and Carter's subsequent concession speech resulted in a lowered voter turnout in my home State of California. Some citizens actually standing in line waiting to vote left their polling places without casting their ballots when they heard the projections that Reagan had won. Many more people decided against going to the polls to exercise their right of suffrage upon hearing the network projection a winner in the Presidential race. Numerous Federal, State, and municipal elections were substantially impacted by the lowered voter turnout.

I am pleased to note that the major networks have since made a commitment not to project probable winners in any State until polls in that State have closed. While this solves the problem of exit poll projections, it does not address the situation created when actual east coast results become available hours before polls close on the west coast.

The solution is a uniform poll-closing time. H.R. 3525 will extend the polling hour in the eastern time zone until 9 eastern standard time. This bill will extend Pacific daylight time 1 week during Presidential election years so that west coast polls closing at 7 P.D.T. will do so uniformly with the east coast polls.

The uniform poll closing concept has the support of the board of supervisors in my Sacramento County district. I agree with their conclusion that uniform poll closing will contribute to increased voter turnout in Sacramento County. This conclusion is based upon statistics compiled by Mr. Ernest Hawkins, registrar of voters for Sacramento County. These statistics show that in both 1980 and 1984, the 4 p.m. voter projection was higher than actual turnout.

Mr. Chairman, a uniform poll-closing time would not be an additional burden on the taxpayers and would not require an additional layer of bureaucracy. A uniform poll-closing time will stimulate interest in voting in California. Those of us who cast our ballots on the west coast will know that our votes will be counted at the same time, and will count just as much, as votes cast on the east coast.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3525, a well considered and carefully structured piece of legislation that will establish a uniform poll closing time, a sorely needed improvement in our election procedures in this time of instantaneous national reportage by the electronic media.

Mr. Chairman, every 4 years we hear of voters, especially in the Far West, who report they were discouraged from going to the polls on Presidential election days because the issue had been decided by the networks hours before the polls were to close in their locals.

In several instances, notably in Washington State, Oregon, and California, local and congressional elections were undisputedly affected by the lower turnout that came after network announcements of the outcome of the Presidential race.

Mr. Chairman, we are not asking the States to adopt drastic change. Indeed, States coast to coast have supported the intent and the mechanics of H.R. 3525.

This change, long overdue, will be a positive step in bringing order to our sometimes chaotic system of electing a President.

I wish to commend my colleagues Mr. SWIFT and Mr. THOMAS for their outstanding efforts on behalf of this excellent bill.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Pursuant to the rule, the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the reported bill shall be considered as an original bill for the purpose of amendment. Each section shall be considered as having been read.

The Clerk will designate section 1.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GREGG

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREGG: On page 4, after line 7 insert the following:

"(b) Notwithstanding subsection (a), a polling place shall close, with respect to a Presidential general election, as provided by the law of the State involved, in the case of a polling place at which each person who is eligible to vote has voted.

On page 4, line 8, strike out "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof "(c)".

Mr. GREGG (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, this is a fairly innocuous amendment. What it says, in very simple terms, is that if you are in a precinct where everybody votes, everybody in the precinct who is a registered voter goes to the polls and votes, then you do not have to keep your polls open until 9 o'clock at night. This affects three States: New Hampshire, Montana, and Idaho, where they have State laws, because the size of our towns and our communities are quite small in many instances. I have a number of towns, for example, with voting populations of under 25.

In those instances, the votes are cast in the household of the local registrar or the local moderator, usually in her kitchen. As a result, people come by and she checks them off until everybody in town has voted. Or he checks them off until everybody has voted. Then they close up shop and they count the votes. It does not take too long because usually there is only about 10 or 20 votes to be counted, and they report the votes to the Secretary of State.

Now, to ask those people to be open until 9 o'clock at night makes absolutely no sense. It obviously will not prejudice the election to allow those very small towns to close their polling places after everybody in the town has voted. As I say, this is a simple amendment. It simply requests that in those instances where 100 percent of the people who are registered vote, that in those instances the polls may be closed before 9 o'clock. It is obviously going to affect only a few towns throughout the Nation.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SWIFT. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, we have had an opportunity on this side to examine this amendment and believe it to be constructive and would be happy to accept it.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. THOMAS of California. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the gentleman from New Hampshire because not only is it eminently logical that you ought to be able to close the polling place after everyone who is eligible to vote has voted, it also provides, I think, an incentive for any other precinct that might feel that they would like to close at an earlier time. All they have to do is go out and make sure that everyone of the eligible voters has voted. I appreciate that kind of incentive and we have no problem with the amendment.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt, because this amendment allows local units of governments to do what they have been doing before, to conduct their elections in a reasonable manner that suits the citizens of their area, that the amendment makes the bill less worse than it is. But what the amendment does it points out the essential, nonsensical nature of the bill.

The two gentlemen who are promoting this bill, until we came to the floor today, did not care about Dixville Notch, a little hamlet in New Hampshire, which is the first unit of government to report in every Presidential general election.

□ 1645

That is a great American tradition, and I am glad the gentleman from New Hampshire has persuaded the managers of the bill to allow that tradition to continue.

The bill's unreasonable requirements on the towns dear to the gentleman from New Hampshire have now been relieved, but the unreasonable requirements on 39 other States are still not relieved. That is my problem with the bill.

A previous speaker said that only a few States will have to keep their polls open more than an hour longer. The gentleman from California said this was a "minimal" change in voting laws. The gentleman from Washington said there were "modest" changes in election hours. Yet as I look through the list that I have, I have to believe that those changes are pretty strong. I count 12 or 13 States which have their voting hours extended by more than 1 hour, and I count 39 States that have their voting times changed. That is a drastic change.

So, yes, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire is worthwhile. It removes some of the ridiculous and onerous restrictions of the bill. The only way the gentleman from New Hampshire could have done better is to see that the whole bill is defeated.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentleman from New Hampshire would answer a question for me in relation to this amendment.

Mr. GREGG. Yes, I will, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, I detect what appears to be an ambiguity, and perhaps the gentleman can clarify it.

According to the language here, it speaks of "a polling place at which each person who is eligible to vote has voted." That is the operative language at the end of the amendment.

There is a situation where, on the polling books in the polling place where I live, an individual's name can show up as a registered voter when that person has in fact moved from the precinct. There is also a possibility that that person could still legally vote in that precinct. In other words, the person who has registered to vote has moved from the precinct, but because they moved in the last 30 days before the election, they did not have time to establish residence in another precinct. To all intents and purposes, the judges sitting at the polling place would believe that person has moved away.

At this point, would the person be eligible to vote, in their estimation, and, therefore, they would have to leave the polls open until the last minute if a registered voter is on the books and has not appeared?

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, that would be a determination for the moderator, I would think, as to whether or not that was a registered voter who qualified to vote in the precinct.

Mr. DURBIN. I would suggest to the gentleman that that raises an ambiguity that may cause some problems in precincts, unlike your own, where only maybe 50 voters in some precincts are all known to everyone and no one has moved in or out of town in a period of time.

In an area of the country where there is a more mobile population, there is a possibility that the polling place would be closed before a registerd voter could show up to vote. You could be disenfranchising a person who, although they have moved from a precinct, could still legally vote in the precinct. It would seem to me that the language would be clearer if it said: "A polling place at which each person who registered to vote at that polling place has voted."

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I think we can clear that up in the report language. It seems to me that that type of technicality is something that would probably be inappropriate to legislate. We are dealing with districts where obviously by definition we are going to have very small numbers of people registered in that district or else you are not going to get 100 percent anyway.

Mr. DURBIN. If the gentleman would respond to this question, the amendment which I have before me does not limit the size of the precinct.

Mr. GREGG. No, it does not, but I think as a practical matter the size of the precinct is limited.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman that perhaps if a person who is legally registered to vote in this country shows up to vote at a time when he believes his polling place is open and finds the door locked and is unable to vote, it would not be any small matter to that person, and perhaps it is a matter we ought to consider as we make a rule which will apply to literally hundreds of thousands of precincts across America.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURBIN. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I would make the point that the amendment refers to State law. If this amendment is passed on this bill, it would not take away from the States the right to define "eligible voter." I think it should be left to the States in that regard.

So should an ambiguity develop—I really do not think it will, but should an ambiguity develop, the State would have the authority in that regard.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, there are only three States to which this applies anyway, and Illinois is not one. It would only apply to Idaho, Montana, and New Hampshire.

Mr. DURBIN. Would the gentleman be kind enough to explain to me why this only applies to three States?

Mr. GREGG. Because it is only where State law allows a polling place to close when everyone has voted.

Mr. SWIFT. If the gentleman will yield, there is nothing in this that would prevent a State from so changing its State law, but currently only three States choose to do it that way.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, I will be honest with the gentleman. Having read the amendment, I did not conclude that that was the original intent, that only three States would be affected.

Mr. GREGG. Well, that is the intent. There is language that may not be on the copy the gentleman has which says, "as provided by the law of the State involved." That is in the introductory language.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman, and I am happy that the gentleman clarified that point for me.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GREGG].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FRENZEL

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Minnesota that the first part of his amendment amends the title of the bill, and the title cannot be amended in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the Chair for pointing that out.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman wishes to strike the first part of the amendment, the amendment could be considered.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the language of my amendment referring to the title of the bill be deleted from my amendment, and that the amendment be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will disregard that portion referring to the title and will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENZEL: On page 3, line 18, strike "continental".

On page 4, line 1, strike "continental".

On page 4, line 2, strike "continental".

On page 4, beginning on line 9, strike subsection (1).

On page 4, line 12, strike (2) and insert in lieu thereof (1).

On page 4, line 14, strike (3) and insert in lieu thereof (2).

Mr. FRENZEL (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered, and which I have asked not to be read in its entirety, makes changes in a number of pages of the bill deleting the word, "continental."

The intention of the amendment is to put Alaska and Hawaii under the full force and effect of the law. The managers of this bill, who were so concerned that the precious voting rights of people in the Western part of the United States would be violated if they knew what happened in the East a few minutes before their own polls closed, either forgot, or for some reason omitted, putting Hawaii and Alaska, our two most Western States, under this bill.

I can only assume that they decided that the precious voting rights of the people of Alaska and Hawaii were less precious than the precious voting rights of Oregon, Washington, California, et cetera. Perhaps they can explain that later. I can't. The unhappy result is that we now have a two-tiered operation here that says that some of our voters need protection and some of our voters do not need protection. That paradox gives evidence of congressional whimsey.

I do not think this amendment is going to be accepted by this body. It should be. If we are going to have a uniform closing time for the polls, it should include all the States of this great Union. I certainly believe that Hawaii and Alaska are part of the Union, even though they are the most recently admitted States. I see no reason to exempt them or to set them aside.

In fact, they are the ones whose precious voting rights are most threatened if the gentleman from Washington and the gentleman from California are correct in their reasoning that knowing about other States' results somehow will prejudice one's vote in a Western State. In its present state the bill saves the least imperiled, and leaves the most imperiled in danger.

I do not think the people of Alaska and the people of Hawaii would like my amendment. I do not think they want to be in this bill, nor do I think most of the people in the United States want to be in this bill. My amendment merely shows that the bill, not the amendment, is frivolous.

□ 1655

Mr. Chairman, why would anyone protect some Western States and not protect other Western States? What is more blessed about Washington and California than about Hawaii and Alaska?

If we are going to have a uniform poll closing time, this bill doesn't do it. Its title is as inaccurate as the managers' descriptions of the difficulties it will cause.

The gentleman from Washington said, I believe more than once, that we were being presented with a uniform poll closing time. Well, it is sort of uniform, except it is not uniform.

I have another amendment that deals with primary elections. We have forgotten about primary elections. Your sacred, precious right to vote in primary elections is not as sacred and precious under this bill as your right in Presidential general elections, nor is your right in other than Presidential elections.

Somehow we have got this thing arranged so that a few dozen of us in this committee will decide whose rights, under what conditions, are precious and sacred. Then we will protect them in our way, which is, more often than not, contrary to the way the States want them to go.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment merely to show that the bill is not providing a uniform closing time, that it makes unreasonable distinctions between citizens of some States and citizens of other States who are subject to the same risks and hazards. My amendment shows that the bill, if it is what it says it is, is then without merit.

Mr. Chairman, I hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I think the gentleman's amendment does not show weakness in the bill. It shows that you can take any bill and make it ridiculous.

What this bill would do is close the polls in Alaska at 5 p.m. and close the polls in Hawaii at 4 p.m. That is not going to be acceptable to anyone in Alaska or Hawaii.

The gentleman asks why did we choose to do this? Well, this is a very great and large country and being able to try to come up with a workable solution between the four time zones in the continential United States was in itself difficult. Adding the additional time that this would be stretched out for Alaska and Hawaii was a conundrum, not one that the committee ignored. We counseled with the representatives from Hawaii. We held a hearing in Anchorage, AK, to explore this.

Essentially what they said is, "Look, if the majority of the States are going to be able to resolve this problem in a way that makes sense to them, you will have to apply it to us"—exactly as the gentleman's amendment does—"to close our polls so early is unacceptable to us. We believe that you can craft a solution that will help the 48 States resolve this problem. We do not believe you can craft a solution that is in any way acceptable to us if you force us to close our polls that soon."

They point out that due to their geographical locations the people in those two States, while they may not like it, do get used to things occurring much earlier in terms of their network programming, in terms of news, and so forth. As a result, the kind of thing that occurs has less psychological effect on people in these 2 States than it does in the continental 48.

We were asked by these States, so that they would not have to deal with the sharp and extraordinarily early and unfair closing times that are contained in this amendment, to exempt them from the bill and we acceded to their wishes.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

I do not find impressive the argument that we ought to include Alaska and Hawaii or somehow this bill is fatally flawed. Because you can come up with a solution for 95 percent of Americans, you ought to discard it because it does not cover the entire 100 percent. Those of us who live on the west coast are familiar with the time anomalies that Hawaiians and to a degree Alaskans have to deal with, it is tough enough to get up at 3 a.m. to watch the beginning of the Rose Parade or to have your Monday night football games come on at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. They are used to the adjustments necessary.

Clearly, if we were to extend a uniform time closing to the furthest tip of the Aleutian Islands or to Hawaii, that you would be dealing with an absolute impossible late evening or early morning time situtation on the east coast.

What we have done is attempt to provide a solution to a problem not to deal in abstract uniformities.

This legislation attempts to deal in a realistic way with a real problem and this amendment clearly is deleterious and I would ask that it be defeated.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

I think the gentleman's amendment has made the point very effectively as to the fundamental flaw of this bill. I mean, if you are going to be honest about it, I do think that Hawaii and Alaska are a part of this Union.

The fact is Hawaii, I do not believe, is any further from California than New Hampshire is from California. We just happen to be separated by a land mass and they are separated by a water mass.

As a very practical matter, I do not see how you can effectively enforce this type of discrimination on New Hampshire if you are not going to enforce it on Hawaii and Alaska. It is not fair. It is not equal protection of the law.

The fact is that it shows this bill is flawed and it is so flawed that we should probably put it to rest right here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

The question was taken; and on a division [demanded by Mr. FRENZEL] there were—ayes 6, noes 7.

So the amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FRENZEL

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENZEL: On page 1, after the word "for" in the title, insert the following: "for Presidential primary dates on which there is more than one State conducting its primary election and".

Mr. FRENZEL [during the reading]. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the making of the point of order at this point in the proceedings.

POINT OF ORDER

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would be happy to let the gentleman conduct his debate. If the gentleman would like, I would be happy to withhold until he has had a chance to comment on the amendment before making my point of order, if that would be agreeable to the gentleman.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I think we may as well go ahead with the point of order.

Mr. SWIFT. In that case, Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment on the grounds that it is in violation of clause 7 of rule XVI, the germaneness rule. I would say in particular "Deschler's Procedure," chapter 28, section 7, to the effect that "one individual proposition is not germane to another individual proposition." This bill deals exclusively with Presidential general elections. The amendment deals with Presidential primary elections and I make the point of order that it is not germane.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized on the point of order.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I have had this done to me before on a very similar point of order which was sustained by the Chair a number of years ago. I suspect that the precedents are not with me on it; nevertheless I think any rational reading of our rules and of our precedents in a philosophical way and any presentation to a body of Americans who can read or write would result in the amendment being declared germane.

The committee clearly has jurisdiction over matters of election laws. This bill clearly deals with an election law. This amendment of mine clearly deals with an election law. It happens to be a different step in the same process.

Now, I believe that primary elections are just as important as general elections, particularly in Presidentials, because that is the way Presidential candidates get to general elections.

I submit that the primary is inseparable in the process from the general election.

To sustain the point of order would be to say that if we had an election law covering half the States, we could not have an amendment that affected the other half of the States, or to make distinctions between parts of the political process it seems to me does not make any sense at all.

I do not know how the Chair is going to rule on this. All I can say is that it is very hard for the general public to understand that you can separate a general election from a primary election and make one not able to be amended on to the other.

I believe that the point of order should be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BARNARD). The Chair is prepared to rule.

In this case the matter of germaneness need not be decided, inasmuch as the amendment clearly violates rule XIX because it only amends the title of the bill and the title of the bill can only be amended after the bill is passed; so the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word. I do so to discuss an amendment I had intended to offer today. The amendment would have changed election day from Tuesday to Sunday on a one-time trial basis during the 1992 Presidential election. The amendment would have also required the Federal Election Commission to study the impact of this change on voter turnout and recommend to Congress whether the change should be made permanent. This amendment is very similar to legislation I first authored in 1980 and reintroduced this year as H.R. 639. Quite simply Sunday elections would help to increase our Nation's dismal voter turnout rate by making it more convenient for people to vote.

Based on assurances I have received from the distinguished chairman of the Elections Subcommittee, I will not be offering this amendment today. However, I do want to discuss the idea.

Perhaps the best argument of all for Sunday voting is that it has proven so successful in other countries. At my request, the Congressional Research Service examined 111 separate elections held in 29 democracies between the years 1968 and 1984. Elections held on Sunday, which occurred in such places as France, West Germany, and Sweden, averaged an 83.6 percent voter turnout rate—more than 10 percentage points higher than the elections held on a weekday. The average voter turnout rate for U.S. elections was a disgraceful 46.3 percent.

More than anything else, Sunday elections would help to resolve the work conflict. Under our current system, 80 percent of the voting hours occur while people are working or are traveling to or from work.

Some have suggested that Sunday voting might result in added costs, due to such things as paying election workers premium wages. However, that argument is weakened considerably by a survey of State election officials I conducted on this issue. Of the 18 State election officials who responded, 11 of them indicated that Sunday voting would result in little or no additional expenses. It should also be noted that voting hours could be shortened if elections were held on a nonworkday, thus actually, reducing certain costs.

Before I first introduced my Sunday election proposal in 1980, I contacted religious leaders throughout the country to obtain their views about how American church life might be affected. Surprisingly, the response was quite favorable. For instance, the head of the U.S. Catholic Conference wrote, "I cannot see how (Sunday voting) would react negatively on church obligations, but might rather emphasize the moral aspects of voter responsibility for all citizens * * * voting on Sunday, then, could be quite consistent with Catholic social ministry."

An official from the Episcopal Church Center echoed this same sentiment, saying, "The possibility of having Sunday as an election day raises no problem from a religious standpoint."

I would point out that those who do have religious objections would not be prevented from voting, since the absentee ballot is designed to accommodate those types of situations.

Will Sunday voting work in the United States? Why speculate? Let's try it and find out. Surely, the voter turnout results can't be any worse than they already are.

Mr. Chairman, at this time I would like to engage the distinguished gentlemen from Washington in a colloquy to reaffirm his earlier assurances to me regarding Sunday voting. Specifically, I would like to know if he agrees that Sunday voting is an appealing idea, one that he and his subcommittee intend to seriously consider?

□ 1710

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BIAGGI] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BIAGGI was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIAGGI. I will be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, first of all, having served with the gentleman as one of the panelists on the ABC-Harvard symposium on voter participation, I know of the gentleman's long-time concern with increasing voter participation, voter turnout, and particularly his interest in Sunday voting as a means of doing it.

The committee, admittedly in this bill, was looking primarily for a solution to the early projection issue, but we are also very concerned about what can be done to encourage greater participation. We do plan to undertake hearings on a variety of proposals, more liberal registration and so forth, including Sunday voting, to examine it very carefully to see what it could contribute to an increased voter participation in the United States of America.

Mr. BIAGGI. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the Committee on House Administration for the extensive work it has done to resolve the difficult problem of poll closing times and early election predictions. I am well aware of the hours the committee has invested in discussions with State, local, and party officials in many States. However, reluctantly, I will vote against the bill.

Vermont is one of the first States to vote and close its polls. However, because the majority of towns still use paper ballots, vote counting is a slow process, often continuing until midnight. The Secretary of State James Douglas has expressed the opposition of most town officials to keeping the polls open for an additional 2 hours. This would push the final vote tallying into the wee hours of the morning, thereby increasing general exhaustion and the possibility of error. In addition, towns would have to deal with confusion resulting from polls closing earlier in non-Presidential election years.

Progress has been made in securing an agreement from the networks to refrain from exit polling and early predictions until the polls are closed. However, mediawide adherence to this pledge is necessary if there is to be any solution to this problem. While this bill provides a remedy for one aspect of the early predictions problem, it does not address the central issue of media restraint.

In sum, I can appreciate the perplexing nature of this problem, but I cannot support a solution that would cause undue confusion and difficulty for Vermont.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FRENZEL

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENZEL: Strike out line 16 on page 4 and all that follows through line 3 on page 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. STUDY BY SECRETARY OF TRANSPORTATION

The Secretary of Transportation shall conduct a study of the impact that an extension of daylight saving time in the Pacific time zone to the first Sunday after the date of each Presidential general election would have on the air and surface transportation system of the Nation. The Secretary shall report the results of the study to the Congress not later than December 31, 1986.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment, which may not have been clear from the reading, is to strike the 2-week daylight saving time gimmick which relates to 4½ Western States, and to insert in its place a study by the Secretary of Transportation. The purpose of that study is to find out whether my position, that is, that this extra 2 weeks does too much damage to our passenger and freight transportation system, to our communications system, and to the movement of people and materials across the country, or whether, as the gentleman from Washington says, it is a matter of minor inconvenience.

Mr. Chairman, we have referred to the Air Transport Association of America in a letter which I received from its senior vice president on November 4. That organization cites more than disruption. The disruption is supposed to be the most serious problem. According to that group, particularly with regard to fitting schedules together from areas that are not on daylight savings to another that is, but only on a temporary basis. Airline schedules, as everyone knows, and crew assignments, fit together very carefully into little pieces like a jigsaw puzzle, and they are difficult enough to manipulate and for passengers or traffic managers to understand when we have them under normal conditions. But, when we have a temporary 4½ States, 2-week adventure, I think it will cause some real trouble.

I do not know very much about airline guides. I do know that this agency says it will incur substantial costs to develop and publish two complete schedules within a 2-week period. It also indicates that crew scheduling problems will be a matter of difficulty.

The fourth point that organization makes is that airlines will have some difficulty with noise curfews. The gentleman from Washington says that would affect only six airports. I presume he knows more about it than I do. I think if it affects even a single airport it is going to be an additional burden which is more than our country should have to bear.

We have just deregulated the airlines. Even so, they seem to be one sector of our transportation industry that is getting along pretty well. I would hope that we would not insert this little 2-week moment of madness which will confuse the customers of the system as well as those who have to operate it.

Again, I would not make the amendment if I thought the 2-week period of daylight saving time for 4½ States was going to do something that would ultimately benefit the people or the people's voting franchise. Since we do not care about Hawaii and Alaska, obviously we only care about some, not all, voting franchises. Therefore, it seems to me to be reasonable to pass this amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, in the gentleman's general discussion of his desire for a study, he indicated the communications system as well. Since the amendment is restricted to air and surface transportation, does the gentleman wish to expand his amendment so that the study be of the communications system as well, or was that just a discussion about how this is going to rent the fabric of the Nation?

Mr. FRENZEL. That was just an additional discussion for the gentleman's edification.

Mr. THOMAS of California. If the gentleman will yield further, you are only concerned about the rending of the fabric of the Nation in the area of the air and the surface transportation?

Mr. FRENZEL. No, I am not. I am concerned with rending the fabric of our Nation's economy in all respects, but the ones I have put in the amendment are the ones that I deem to be most serious.

Mr. THOMAS of California. If the gentleman will yield further, this gentleman from California, who is vitally affected and wants to see this bill passed, appreciates the gentleman from Minnesota, whose State is not affected under this legislation at all, taking up the guantlet.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this concern was brought to our attention by the Air Transport Association, and we examined it with considerable care. Their concerns are overdrawn, to say the very least, in part, I think, because they did not understand our bill rather than we did not understand their problems.

This is what the effect would be: They are arguing, it is going to upset our scheduling of our personnel and all of that because they seem to have the idea that you are going to go into some kind of a time warp any time you go through the Pacific time zone.

Well, obviously, time is time, regardless of what you happen to call it in a time zone, and nothing is going to change. The air transport people were able to function perfectly well in this country when there was no uniform time at all, and they are going to be able to function very effectively now.

The one problem that this bill could cause, and the only problem this bill could cause, would be in an airport in the Pacific time zone which limited the hours during which they could land or take off. The way this works out, it would be at the end of the day where there are curfews, and in six cities in California, that is the total extent of it, and in some of those it is a voluntary rather than a mandatory thing. In talking with people from California, in talking with the Aviation Subcommittee of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, we found that there was no reason to believe that accommodations could not be made in that 2-week period for those curfews once every 4 years.

The fact is we believe there is no interruption whatever.

We did not stop there; we went further. We asked the CRS analyst in Transportation to examine the potential effects. His conclusion, after studying the bill and conferring with other CRS analysts was that the potential problem for the airlines, and I quote: "Do not strike us as insurmountable."

He went on to say, and I quote again: "We believe that potential problems for other common carrier transportation modes; rail, truck and bus, would also be minor" and then he pointed out, and I quote again: "Prior to the more uniform adoption of daylight saving time that exists at present, the airlines and other transportation modes were able to operate in different time settings without significant problems."

It is clear from an examination of this, which we took the trouble to make, that there is no problem of any significance that cannot be dealt with, and therefore, I think, to suggest that we farm this out for further study is simply to not recognize what one can figure out with an examination of the facts themselves; that the amendment is totally unnecessary, and I urge all of my colleagues to oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. FRENZEL) there were—ayes 5, noes 9.

So, the amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FRENZEL

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENZEL: On page 3, line 18, insert the following: "primary and" before the word "general".

On page 4, line 4, after the word "election" insert the following: "or a Presidential primary election in which there is more than one State conducting its primary election,".

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to going ahead with the point of order at this point in the process. There is no reason for a delay.

POINT OF ORDER

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKART] is recognized to make his point of order.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer a point of order based on clause 7 of rule XVI, the germaneness rule. I would cite in particular Deschler's Procedure, chapter 28, section 7 to the effect that "one individual proposition is not germane to another individual proposition." This bill deals exclusively with Presidential general elections. The amendment deals with Presidential primary elections. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane and would go further to the point that suggest that not all States in fact have primaries. Many have conventions, many have other delegate selection processes known as caucuses, and therefore the application of this amendment across general election procedures would not be uniform. Therefore I insist on my point of order based on the germaneness rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] wish to address the point of order?

Mr. FRENZEL. I do, Mr. Chairman.

It is true that the primary system is nonuniform. It is also true that this bill is not uniform, since it now eliminates certain jurisdictions, and, of course, from the origination did not include two of our great States, who have a part in both the general and the primary process.

However, the point that I made is, that without primary elections it would be impossible to select the candidates for the general election; and to say that a person's vote in the general election has a different value or weight than one in the primary election, I think, is something that is antithetical to our form of representative government.

It is all one process; it is inseverable, and whatever the precedent says about this thing, I think most sentient Americans would suggest that an election bill handled by a committee with election jurisdiction that could not be amended for a primary would be a very strange election bill, indeed.

I believe that the point of order should be rejected, and I yield the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BARNARD). The Chair is prepared to rule.

As stated in the committee report, the sole purpose of the bill is to regulate Presidential general elections in terms of poll closing. An amendment to extend the scope of the bill to Presidential primary elections is not germane under the principle that an individual proposition is not germane to another individual proposition although the two may belong to the same class, and the point of order is sustained.

Are there any other amendments?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FRENZEL

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENZEL: on page 5, add the following section:

SEC. 4. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by this Act shall not apply unless prior to September 1, of the Presidential election year, all of television networks state, in writing in a form proscribed by the Federal Election Commission, their intention not to use exit poll data to suggest, through interpretation of that data, the probable winner in any State until polls in that State have closed and each of the major party Presidential and Vice-presidential nominees state, in writing in a form proscribed by the Federal Election Commission, their intention not to declare victory or concede defeat prior to all of the polls closing in the United States.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I have just a technical point. In the copy of the amendment that I have, the word "proscribed" is used rather than "prescribed" and I could not tell from the Clerk; I think the gentleman means "prescribed".

Mr. FRENZEL. I do mean "prescribed" and I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SWIFT. I would accede to a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk make the typographical correction.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The change is noted; the amendment is modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENZEL, as modified: On page 5, add the following section:

SEC. 4. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by this Act shall not apply unless prior to September 1 of the Presidential election year, all of television networks state, in writing in a form prescribed by the Federal Election Commission, their intention not to use exit poll data to suggest, through interpretation of that data, the probable winner in any state until polls in that state have closed and each of the major party presidential and vice-presidential nominees state, in writing in a form prescribed by the Federal Election Commission, their intention not to declare victory or concede defeat prior to all of the polls closing in the United States.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, it is good to know that in addition to being a broadcaster, the gentleman was probably an editor in another incarnation.

Mr. Chairman, this bill before us is based on many slender reeds. One of the slenderest is that which says this subcommittee has some sort of guarantee from the networks that they will not do any of their early projection work or exit polling work.

If the bill is going to be passed, and I think it should not be and I think it will not be, it seems to me that it is important that this body have the guarantee that the assertions made to one subcommittee are indeed something that the networks are willing to stand behind fully.

This amendment is intended to make more definitive the 1984 statements or letters, statements to the subcommittee and letters to the subcommittee chairman and its ranking member by various networks.

Networks do come and go. They change. Their management changes. Their ownership changes. Their boards of directors change. I think the least that we can do is to suggest that sometime close to the date of the election, if we are going to unsettle 39 States and force them to revise their laws about the way they close and open their polls, the least we can do is to pass this amendment and ask that these networks stand up and be counted in a little more emphatic way.

In addition, another slender reed on which this bill hangs is the idea that a Presidential candidate in 1980 conceded too soon and that people went home from the voting lines because of that. Here, my amendment would also require that Presidential candidates or nominees in writing again prescribed, not proscribed, by the Federal Election Commission state their intention not to declare victory or concede defeat prior to all of the polls closing in the United States.

It seems to me these are simple requirements; they fit what I think is the irrational rationale of the bill, imperfect as it may be, and would, in my judgment, strengthen the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is a most mischievous amendment. It sets the stage for something I cannot believe the gentleman from Minnesota intends: It would permit a Presidential candidate who could feel that his strength lay in those States who would report first to refuse to sign the amendment, short circuit the uniform poll closing process, let his votes come in early and hope he could stampede the country.

□ 1730

I am sure that is not what the gentleman from Minnesota intended. It is precisely what the amendment could do, and it should be defeated summarily.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWIFT. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

To tell the gentleman in more precise terms what this gentleman intended, it was to show that the assurances that the gentleman has are less than ironclad and that he is, in my judgment, asking the States to do things they should not have to do and do not want to do on the basis of promises that he has that are not hard promises.

So I ask the gentleman is he going to get all the networks and are they going to certify on a stack of Bibles or the Constitution or a letterhead or a corporate resolution that this is indeed going to be the case?

Mr. SWIFT. Well, the answer to the gentleman is twofold: First of all, they already have. Second, that does not obviate the fact that the gentleman's amendment not only would seek to draw that more tightly but it does set up the kind of mischievous loophole that I have just indicated and, in any event, should be defeated.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this amendment once again, as the prior amendments of the gentleman from Minnesota have done, points out the fundamental failures of this bill. What you have here is a situation that we are proposing to pass legislation which has as its basic foundations an agreement with the networks. I do not see how we can really take with a great deal of seriousness such an agreement. The networks, by definition, probably cannot live by such an agreement because they are in competition. Once one network begins to give on this point, the other two networks have to jump in and give also. They must compete with each other for news. If we just have some sort of ethereal agreement from them or some sort of letter or some sort of understanding upon which we pass this legislation, it is pretty clear that when the pressures come down to the day of getting those ratings on the day of that election, that that sort of ethereal agreement is going to lose out to the need for a higher rating and a need to get the viewer participation in order to sell the advertising.

Thus I believe we have to, if we are going to have this type of legislation which is based on network participation, have the networks participate, not by some sort of agreement which everyone believes exists but by an agreement which is actually written and produced in stone.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

As I understand it, the gentleman from Washington has an agreement from the major networks that they will not do exit polling. Is that correct?

Mr. GREGG. I am not absolutely sure what the agreement provides.

Mr. HYDE. Would the gentleman from Washington state what his understanding is on this agreement?

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. I will yield to the gentleman from Washington if he wants to respond.

Mr. SWIFT. I would be happy to respond. I thank the gentleman.

First of all, the agreement is between the three networks and the Subcommittee on Elections and was presided over in a ministerial way, if you will, by the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS] and myself.

What it provides is the following: That the networks agree not to use exit poll information, information they have gained from exit polls, to project or characterize, or in any way hint at a probable winner until the polls have been closed in a given State.

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GREGG. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman.

It is my experience as an avid newspaper reader that matters of tight secret national security get printed in the papers without any qualms; things that can affect the security of this country, of the West, of intelligence operatives placed around the globe, and these are fairly routine and without the slightest qualm.

I have listened to media debates about, "How far would you go to get a story?" "Would you burglarize somebody's office; if it was on somebody's desk would you take it?"

It seems to me the highest duty of a media person is to get that news and communicate it, whatever the cost.

So I would suggest or I would say that an agreement by the networks not to publicize something, information which they have received, is like Samuel Johnson's characterization of second marriages: 'A triumph of hope over experience."

I thank the gentleman for yielding

Mr. GREGG. I thank the gentleman from Illinois. I think the gentleman has made the point well. I believe without the Frenzel amendment it is fairly clear that there is no enforcement mechanism placed on the networks to comply with their agreement and that by definition, as the gentleman from Illinois so succinctly pointed out, these networks, by the definition of their purpose, will not be able to live up to such an agreement unless it is part of the legislation.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this gentleman appreciates the efforts of those who earlier were trying to defeat the bill to now solve some of the quote, unquote, problems with the bill. Clearly, though, the gentleman from Washington has pointed out the mischievous nature of this particular amendment. It would allow anyone to hold hostage the process.

It is interesting to point out in the amendment that while the gentleman from Minnesota pleads for each and every last voter, no matter where they may be, in Hawaii or Alaska, he contains it only to the major party Presidential and Vice Presidential nominees and is not concerned about the minor party nominees that are involved.

I would say to those of you who are concerned that the networks perhaps attempted to dupe those of us who dealt with them not just over long hours but over long months of trying to convince them that this was in their own interest, and they finally arrived at the conclusion that it was in their own interest.

The networks, if you will examine, which I have available and will in the House ask that this extraneous material be placed in the RECORD, a letter signed by Lawrence K. Grossman, president of the News Division of the National Broadcasting Co., a letter signed by Roone Arledge, president of ABC News, and a letter by Edward M. Joyce, president of CBS News.

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS of California. I would certainly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WYDEN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS]. I just think the gentleman from Minnesota's amendment essentially delegates to a private citizen whether a law will be effective. That strikes me as highly peculiar and of dubious constitutionality. I want to yield back to the gentleman from California, and I associate myself with his remarks.

Mr. THOMAS of California. I thank the gentleman.

If I might make this point: In terms of the negotiations with the networks, those who feel perhaps uncomfortable in the networks' corporate policy which is now stated in the letters which have been sent to the gentleman from Washington and myself and that will be on record in the congressional journal; I guess they do not just appreciate the number of months spent in discussing the way in which we could solve our problem and that one of the clear obstacles was the networks, since they had to be part of the solution rather than the problem.

I also apparently feel that the gentleman from Minnesota does not realize that the candidates are already part of the solution and not part of the problem, as was witnessed by the election in November 1984 in which the candidates not only wanted to sign those but were glad to sign them because they wanted to be part of the solution. The networks are now part of the solution; the candidates are part of the solution.

What we are trying to do is move legislation so that the Congress can afford the mechanism which will resolve the problem.

The letters referred to are as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, December 6, 1984.

Hon. LAWRENCE K. GROSSMAN,
President, NBC News, NBC,
New York, NY.

DEAR MR. GROSSMAN: As you know, on November 6, 1984 both presidential candidates honored their commitment to withhold commenting on the trends for results of voting behavior of America's citizenry until 11:00 p.m. EST or until the polls had closed in the lower 48 states. The networks (ABC, CBS, NBC) also honored their commitment of not projecting winners until after the polls had closed in a given state.

Yet, despite adherence to these commitments, potential voters were confronted with a network-announced winner for President with as much as three hours left before polls in the West had closed.

The Congress had urged a solution to this dilemma by passing H. Con. Res. 321 asking the networks to "voluntarily refrain from characterizing or projecting results of an election before all the polls for the office have closed . . ." But, this solution was unacceptable to the networks because, in their professional judgement, it put them at a disadvantage to their competitors and was a possible violation of their First Amendment freedoms.

In their turn, the networks argued that the dilemma is a result of archaic election laws and that the solution was for Congress to enact uniform poll closing provisions.

Because past discussions have not produced an agreement, we must continue to examine all options available to us as we plan our legislative agenda for the 99th Congress. Before again traveling down a well-worn path, we are compelled to restate our goal of resolving this problem and clearly communicate to you our position:

"We feel that Congress cannot and will not seriously entertain legislation offering a uniform poll closing time or modified voting day or similar solution until the networks are on record with a firm, explicit, public, corporate commitment not to use exit poll data to suggest, through interpretation of that data, the probable winner in any state until polls in that state have closed."

Such a commitment would provide Congress with the needed reassurance that the results of exit polls would not be used, through characterizations, trending (or any other euphemism), to "short-circuit" a lasting solution to this important and seemingly neverending problem. With such a commitment, we feel the networks would have done their part and we in Congress could turn to doing our part in a positive and constructive atmosphere that bodes well for success.

We appreciate your consideration of our views and look forward to your response.

Best regards,

AL SWIFT,
WILLIAM M. THOMAS,
Members of Congress.

NATIONAL BROADCASTING COMPANY, INC.,
New York, NY, December 12, 1984.

The Honorable AL SWIFT,
The Honorable WILLIAM M. THOMAS,
Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMEN: This is in response to your letter of December 6 requesting a "commitment" from NBC News regarding the use of our exit poll data during elections if there were "a uniform poll closing time or modified voting day or similar solution" to the problem we have discussed.

NBC News policy currently requires that we not make an election projection until state election officials begin the release of actual votes.

As I said in a recent talk to the Radio and Television News Directors' Association, "If polls in all 50 states close simultaneously, then NBC News would effectively and realistically be able to hold all the information we gather from our election day polling until after the election is over across the nation."

In short, NBC News policy enables us to go on record with our commitment that we shall not use the exit poll data we gather "to suggest the probable winner in any state until polls in that state have closed." I hope this will give you the reassurance you seek that the results of our exit polls would not be used to "short circuit" a proposed solution along the lines that you have suggested in your letter.

Like you, we hold the conviction that the integrity of the election process is most important to our democracy. I personally believe, as the attached copy of my recent talk in San Antonio indicates, that there are considerable "advantages of a uniform poll closing time" in helping to resolve this issue. As I also pointed out, however, there may well be news releases, interviews or statements by candidates, high campaign officials or others that provide newsworthy information which should be reported in a timely manner. But I do believe your initiative will go a long way to help resolve the basic network news reporting dilemma we all face.

Best regards,

LAWRENCE K. GROSSMAN.

ABC NEWS,
New York, NY, December 12, 1984.

Representative AL SWIFT,
Longworth House Office Building, Washington, DC.

Representative WILLIAM M. THOMAS,
Cannon House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVES SWIFT AND THOMAS: I am responding immediately to your letter received today on behalf of ABC News and the American Broadcasting Companies, Inc. We believe your letter offers a very positive and constructive approach towards resolving the issues raised in Presidential elections when results from one part of the country are known before polls have closed in later time zones.

Throughout this controversy, ABC News has suggested that a uniform national poll closing hour would solve the problem. Your letter states that Congress will not seriously consider a uniform poll closing hour, or similar solution, until the networks are on record with a "firm, explicit, public, corporate commitment not to use exit poll data to suggest, through interpretation of that data, the probable winner in any state until polls in that state have closed."

In fact, ABC News announced before the recent Presidential election that we would "not use exit poll data to suggest the winner of an election in any state until polls in that state have closed," That meant ABC News did not utilize exit polls to characterize, report trends, or in any other way to state or imply the outcome of any election until polls in a given state were closed.

Susequently, in a letter to members of Congress, I urged Congress to enact a uniform poll closing time and called on the other networks to join with ABC News in pledging not to characterize or hint at the outcome from exit polling data prior to a national closing time. In response to your letter, I am reaffirming that commitment. Again, your initiative offers hope of a positive, constructive and lasting solution to this problem. You and your colleagues have the full support of ABC News.

Sincerely,

ROONE ARLEDGE.

CBS NEWS,
January 17, 1985.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SWIFT AND CONGRESSMAN THOMAS: We are delighted to learn that you will be considering legislation establishing a uniform poll closing time in Federal elections.

As you know, CBS has long advocated such a step as the best means of alleviating the problems caused by the patch-quilt of multiple poll closings across several time zones. We also see this solution as the least intrusive to First Amendment Rights.

You have noted in the past that the intent of such a uniform poll closing law would be defeated if the networks characterized or projected the likely outcome of races before the polls close.

And you have accordingly asked us whether we would pledge not to engage in such characterization or projections, based on our election day exit poll results prior to the time the polls close.

As you know, our policy in 1984 and in prior years has been to project the races one state at a time, but not before the polls in each of those states have closed, or in those states with multiple closings, until the vast majority of polls have closed.

This policy is entirely consistent with the request.

However, in recent years we have developed the capability of using our exit polls to arrive at characterizations of the unlikely outcome prior to the time the polls have closed.

We understand that these characterizations would defeat the very purpose of the legislation you are considering.

Since we agree with you that a uniform poll closing law is the only realistic solution to the issues that modern technology has produced, and in furtherance of the realization of such legislation, CBS News will no longer use election day exit polls to characterize races before the polls close in the states involved.

We trust that this letter, which you are free to make part of the record, will be helpful in removing barriers to early and earnest consideration by the Congress of uniform poll closing time legislation. We wish you success in your endeavors.

Sincerely,

EDWARD M. JOYCE,
President.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS of California. Certainly I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. FRENZEL].

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad to know that the candidates were willing to sign the pledges last time and they will this time. That should alleviate the fears of the gentleman from Oregon about the mischievous nature of this particular amendment.

But I noticed in those three letters from the networks, which are only three of many networks, and there may of course be more by the time the Presidential election rolls around, that they refer to the fact that they had in previous years had a similar commitment and they were making one now which was couched in different terms than what the gentleman and the distinguished chairman asked for.

Does that lead the gentleman to believe, as it does me, that next year there may be a third policy and the year after that a different policy? My amendment is simply trying to give some basis to a bill which is on pretty flimsy ground from yard one.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Reclaiming my time, perhaps the gentleman from Minnesota can read more into language than is there because if he will look, for example, at the CBS News letter, it says pretty frankly, boldly, and plainly on page 2 that:

CBS News will no longer use Election Day exit polls to characterize races before the polls close in the States involved.

Now that to me is pretty declaratory. Perhaps the gentleman can read more into that than anyone else can.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment, as modified, offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FRENZEL) there were—ayes 8, noes 10.

So the amendment, as modified, was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FRENZEL

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENZEL: On page 5, after line 16, insert the following new section:

SEC. 4. SUNSET PROVISION.

The amendments made by section 1, section 2, and section 3(a) shall apply only with respect to the Presidential general election in the year 1988, unless otherwise provided by law.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, this is a simple sunset amendment.

What will happen if this bill becomes law is that we will force 39 States to change the way in which they hold elections on Presidential general years. Some of them will have to make adjustments of from 2 to 3 hours in the poll opening times. Thirty-nine of them, nearly 80 percent of the States, will have to make some changes.

We will be having a separate, 2-weeks daylight savings time in 4½ States. There will be mass confusion.

In my judgment, it will result in more people being disenfranchised than have ever been disenfranchised because of discouragement of hearing early results from another source outside of their State.

For that reason, my amendment says if we have to do it, let us do it once only, and then look and see what kind of carnage we have created. If we think it did any good, and if we think the country tolerated it, we can always pass it again. If we think, as I believe we are going to think, that it was an unrelieved, unmitigated disaster, then at least we will be secure in the knowledge that it will not happen again unless the Congress is silly enough to pass it again.

I think we are taking a high risk with a dangerous bill, and I believe it should have a sunset. This amendment provides one. I urge its adoption.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I would suspect if this turned out to be an unremitting and unyielding disaster that the gentleman from Minnesota would quietly inform the body of that fact.

This committee obviously is not going to pass this legislation and walk away from it. This committee clearly will want to take a look at how this works after the 1988 election, and we will hold detailed oversight hearings on it, obviously. But the fact is that the way this place operates, for good and sound reason, is you try to come up with the most appropriately defined legislation that you can, and you pass it, and you watch it, and you adjust it if necessary, and you repeal it if it is necessary.

The idea that you are going to assume disaster is one that the gentleman would like to make because he opposes the legislation. He does not like it, he does not think there is a problem, and he does not think we therefore need a solution. But for those of us who believe, along with the vast majority of the American public, that there is a problem, believe that we have crafted here a restrained, mimimally intrusive solution that will solve that problem. We will take great care to watch carefully how it unfolds. We will have formal hearings following its first implementation, and we will take swift action—no pun intended—should that prove to be necessary.

But to adopt this kind of an amendment is clearly a tactic on the part of those who oppose the bill and, if you support the bill, you should oppose the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I urge its defeat.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

The question was taken; and on a division [requested by Mr. FRENZEL] there was—ayes 8, noes 12.

So the amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. FRENZEL

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. FRENZEL: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the President shall provide for a study, with respect to Presidential general elections, of the impact of the availability of actual results from areas where the polls have closed on voting in areas where polls have not closed. The study shall be conducted in the manner prescribed by the President and shall include—

(1) an examination and analysis of the effect of such availability on total voter participation and patterns of voter participation; and

(2) an assessment of the need for, and the practicality of, a single poll closing time for such elections in the continental United States.

Not later than December 31, 1986, the President shall report the results of the study to the Congress.

Mr. FRENZEL [during the reading]. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent the amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, to give the body some advice, I believe that this is the last amendment that the body will take up. I have tried to expedite the process. I have not asked for recorded votes. It will be my intention to ask for a recorded vote on this particular amendment, and I hope I would get it rather than go through the travail of having a quorum call as well. But that should complete the work on this particular bill.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment was the best I could do to save a little face on the problem of uniform poll closing and still prevent what I think is an unreasonable set of strictures being placed on the States of this great Union.

This bill is based on the fact that the managers believe that some people were done out of their votes because they heard how other people voted. I find that hard to believe. And the study that I have looked at which, when we are in the full House, I will ask to put in the RECORD a piece from the Journal of Public Opinion which relates to the Michigan survey and suggests that instead of 6 to 12 percent found in that survey, that the number 0.2 percent would be more reasonable.

The article referred to follows:

[From the Journal of Public Opinion]

SURVEY RESEARCH AND ELECTION NIGHT PROJECTIONS

(By Laurily Epstein and Gerald Strom)

The passage of time has done nothing to abate criticisms of network projections of Ronald Reagan's victory before polls closed on the West Coast. The visceral reactions that immediately followed the election have been replaced by empirical studies, but the battle is no less intense. Evidence may have supplanted emotionalism, but the aim is the same; to demonstrate that would-be voters were, in fact, dissuaded from voting by the early evening projections.

No one has argued that the projections were incorrect or that they somehow "cheated" Jimmy Carter of a second term in the White House. Instead the accusation is that early evening projections reduce turnout, and that, in turn, affects contests below the presidency.

The issue remains unresolved, despite a spate of studies going back to the 1964 election, which have found that early evening projections have no systematic effect on turnout.[1] Although the early studies used survey data, the sample sizes were so small that the results have been questioned on those grounds alone. The more recent studies have used aggregate data—and are challenged on those grounds—or have used survey data—but have suffered from trying to compare presidential and midterm electorates.

For example, a study we did, published in 1981, looked at turnout from 1960 to 1980 (a period characterized by alternating early evening and late night election projections) by using total votes cast as the numerator and the voting age population as the denominator.[2] It showed that early evening projections did not diminish turnout on the West Coast, at least when compared to turnout trends elsewhere in the country. This study has been critized on the grounds that it is risky to speculate about individual behavior from aggregate data.

A recently published study also used aggregate data, but with California's registered voters as the denominator and ballots cast on election day (absentees were excluded) as the numerator, and showed that turnout on the West Coast was affected by the 1980 projections.[3] But California's registration procedures changed in the mid-1970s, and this may have led to an artificially inflated base of registered voters by 1980.

A study using survey data from the Census in 1972 and 1974 showed that, in 1972, turnout on the West Coast was affected by the early evening projection.[4] This study suffers from two problems. First, it compares presidential and midterm electorates. Second, it indulged in a little projection of its own—using data from the 1972 and 1974 elections to speculate about 1980.

Because voting decisions are made by individuals, there are those who insist that survey data are the only appropriate source of information about potential media effects on turnout. But until 1980, there were no reliable survey data available to address this issue.

In January of 1981, however, the Survey Research Center at the University of Michigan reinterviewed two of their national election samples, asking a series of questions designed to determine the effects of early projections (and Carter's early concession speech) on voting behavior. Both were stratified random samples of the adult population in some of the 48 mainland states.

Of the original 2,579 respondents in the two samples, about 1,800 (69 percent) completed the January telephone interview. This drop in the number of respondents from an otherwise representative national sample is a serious problem with the data. The author of a series of papers based on the data acknowledges that the January 1981 sample is neither random nor representative.[5] These data are, however, the best currently available.

The questions asked of the respondents included: whether or not they had voted; the time of day they had voted (or decided not to vote); their reasons for not voting if they had abstained; and several questions about the time of day they had first heard reports or projections of election results. Because these respondents were a subset of the entire national sample, their responses could be matched with Michigan's vote validation project, which used official voting records to determine whether each respondent was registered to vote and whether the respondent actually voted. Vote validation was critical because voting rates determined by surveys are routinely higher than actual rates. We used only the validated vote in our analysis.

JACKSON'S RESEARCH

John Jackson, the principal investigator of the January 1981 survey, has presented at least three papers analyzing these same data.[6] Using some fairly sophisticated statistical modeling techniques, Jackson asserts that some combination of election night news broadcasts, the early evening projections, and Carter's concession speech lowered overall turnout by 6 to 12 percent. We believe that there are a number of very serious problems with Jackson's methodology and analysis.

First, he reports that there were 1,814 respondents in the survey, but we could find only 1,800 in the tapes furnished by the University of Michigan. Similarly, he excluded respondents for whom there was not complete data, but does not tell the reader what constitutes missing information. Thus, it is unclear how he arrived at the 1,123 respondents used in his analysis.

Second, there are problems with his recoding and collapsing of variables. For example, he assumes that all polls closed at 8:00 p.m. local time,[7] yet a majority did not in 1980. All or parts of twenty-two states closed their polls before 8:00 p.m., twenty-two states and the District of Columbia closed at 8:00 p.m., and all or parts of only five states closed after 8 p.m.

Jackson's findings of reduced turnout are based on model estimates that assess the likelihood of individuals voting before or after 6 p.m. local time (when he believes people nationwide could have heard election news). But since it was less likely for polls to close at 8:00 p.m., the probability Jackson assigns for voting after 6:00 p.m. is undoubtedly incorrect—network projections or no network projections.

Moreover, it appears that he used three time zones instead of four. Additionally, he asserts that the South and the East are on Eastern time, the Midwest is on Central time, and the West is on Pacific time.[8] (There is no reference to the Mountain region, so we are forced to infer that it falls into "the West.") Yet five of the eleven former Confederate states are wholly or partly in a time zone other than Eastern, and large areas of what are typically considered the Midwest are on Eastern, not Central time. And, of course, Mountain states are on Mountain, not Pacific, time.

This lack of specifically regarding time zones and regions may help to account for the peculiar regional coefficients Jackson reports in his various studies.

Third, Jackson uses one model to estimate the likelihood of voting and then uses these results to project turnout. Thus, he compounds normal error in the measurement of variable with additional error in model estimation. Thus, it is very unclear what he is estimating or what the true values of the parameters really are.

A DIFFERENT METHODOLOGY

We steered away from sophisticated statistical models, and looked instead at the actual data collected by Michigan. First, we excluded from their sample respondents who were not registered to vote (22 respondents). We allowed in our pool those who were registered and those for whom registration information was missing or incomplete. This increased the pool of eligible nonvoters—but not the pool of voters—and we may therefore be overstating the numbers who did not vote because of early forecasts. In the end, there were 1,778 respondents in the sample.

These respondents divided neatly into three groups: those who had voted (1,047); those who had not voted (574); and those for whom there was missing information on vote validation (157).

Having identified these three categories of respondents, we tried to establish who might have been affected by election night broadcast information. To do this we used the Michigan respondents' answers to the following questions: 1. When did you vote? 2. If you didn't vote, did you ever intend to vote? 3. If you didn't vote, when did you decide not to vote? 4. If you didn't vote, why not? 5. When did you first hear news reports about the election?

We selected the most liberal question about hearing reports of election results, to bend over backward to make the case for a media impact.

THE SAMPLE

Because we were looking for the impact of election night coverage on those who might have voted but did not, we excluded from our sample the 1,047 respondents who had voted. This left us with 574 nonvoters. Unfortunately, 175 of those claimed to have voted, when in fact they had not; therefore, they could not have been asked the series of questions about why they did not vote. Excluding these missing cases left us with 399 respondents who had been asked the nonvoting questions. Of these, 143 (or 36 percent) stated that they had never intended to vote. Those who stated that they had intended to vote were asked when they had decided not to vote. Of these respondents, 98 said they had decided not to vote before election day, and 103 gave no answer to this question.

That brought us down to 45 respondents who had decided on election day not to vote, and so may have been affected by election night news. When asked for their reasons for abstaining, 41 of these 45 gave reasons other than election night news (e.g. illness, the weather). The remaining four respondents, however, stated they did not vote because they had heard that Carter had lost or was losing. Looked at in this way, election night news may have discouraged 1 percent (4/399) of registered nonvoters from voting. If these four voters had voted, the number of voters in the sample would have gone from 1,047 to 1,051 and the number of nonvoters would have declined from 574 to 570. This implies that actual turnout may have been decreased by 0.2 percent—in other words, if the four had voted, turnout would have been 0.2 percent higher than it was.

THE FLAWS

Although survey research is a well-accepted and popular tool, there are problems associated with analyzing its results. One is the inherent messiness of asking people to recall behavior which occurred several months (and in some cases, years) before the survey is conducted. This is true for all surveys that ask recall questions, including Jackson's.

Among the errors we found in Jackson's data are the following, determined by comparing responses from the January 1981 survey with the earlier Vote Validation Survey:

Eight self-reported nonvoters from the post-election survey reported in January that they had voted, and even gave a time at which they had putatively voted.

Three self-reported voters from the post-election survey reported in January that they had not voted.

Seventy-four individuals reported in the January survey that they had not voted because they had not registered when, in fact, they had.

Thus, at least 5 percent of the sample is known to have given the wrong information about their registration or voting behavior. (This 5 percent overlaps, but not entirely, with the 175 January respondents—10 percent of the sample—who reported that they had voted when, in fact, they had not.) While such a modest misreporting has no particular effect on the entire survey analysis, it can have a devastating effect on the analysis of any given individual's behavior.

Jackson himself admits that there are two problems with his data set. First, he noted that the sample, while drawn from what was originally a set of random samples, is not random and, therefore, not representative of the original sample or of the adult population. Second, he noted that there was error in recall of both time of vote and time of hearing the news.

Our analysis of Jackson's data confirms that the sample was not random. It was skewed toward more upscale respondents. Since such people pay more attention to the media than the less affluent and less educated do, potential media effects are exaggerated by their over-inclusion. Indeed, this may explain why Jackson found that Republicans, not Democrats, were dissuaded from voting because of the coverage.

Our analysis of the data also substantiated Jackson's statement that there was a fair amount of misreporting of when news was heard; many people said they heard the news well before they could have. While we have no way to validate the time of vote, we assume that this, too, was subject to inaccuracy.

CONCLUSION

Our purpose here is not to challenge the integrity of survey research or to criticize the methodology employed by scholars at the University of Michigan. Instead, we wish to note that not all questions can be addressed adequately by survey methodology. The magnitude of media effects on would-be voters is one of those questions. Using the same data—but with strikingly different methods—John Jackson found turnout reduced in 1980 by 6 to 12 percent because of election night coverage. We found four nonvoters, or 0.2 percent of all eligible respondents, who reported that they did not vote because of election night coverage. This discrepancy between Jackson's findings and our own illustrates the difficulties of trying to use survey data to measure the magnitude of media effects.

For those who believe that the difference between 0.2 percent and 6 to 12 percent is insignificant—merely the result of social scientists quibbling over arcane methodological niceties—it should be noted that a large number of people, including some legislators, believe that the networks should cease reporting election news until all polls are closed. Their argument is predicated on the assumption—backed up by data such as Jackson's—that election night projections reduce turnout and thereby interfere with the democratic process. Many people not only believe this—they feel legislation is needed to prohibit network projections.

The state of Washington, for example, recently passed a law banning any exit polling activity less than 300 feet from the polling place. While the law does not explicitly prohibit the practice, it makes it—and any predictions based on exit polls—almost impossible.

We do not believe that there is any evidence that election night news coverage has had a significant effect on turnout. Leaving aside any consideration of the First Amendment and concentrating instead on what are purported to be the facts involved, we see no reason for the networks to discontinue their policy of projecting winners when whatever data the news organizations have amassed allow them to do so.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, the problem with the bill, of course, is that, while it purports to protect the votes of those in Washington, Oregon, and California, it dispatches in a cavalier manner the votes of those in Oregon and Hawaii and, at the same time, provides in some of those very States where it is going to protect the voters less time to vote, because their polls will be closing at 7 p.m. as compared to the usual 8 p.m. How many voters will be confused? How many will think that the old rules apply and not show up? In my guess, there will be a great deal many more doing that than those who would have been discouraged had they heard some early news from elsewhere.

The voters in my State and I believe the voters in those States take their voting franchise not only as a right, but as a duty, and they perform it in great numbers. I know that that is true of at least three of those States that are affected most by this bill.

Now, my amendment scratches the whole bill. It makes the concession that there may be a problem. It asks the President to provide for a study with respect to Presidential general elections of the impact—and I know the Chair will be delighted to hear that it applies only to general elections—the impact of the availability of the actual results from areas where the polls have closed on voting, in areas where the polls have not been closed, et cetera, examination and the analysis of the effect of the availability on participation, and assessment of the need or the practicality of a single poll-closing time for such elections in the continental United States.

This study may put to rest the fears that the managers of this bill have. It may show that the managers of the bill's fears were legitimate. In my judgment, they were not; but let us have a study to take care of it for us.

My problem with the subcommittee—and I would say here parenthetically, Mr. Chairman, that I really regret being in opposition to the two distinguished managers of this bill, whose motivations I consider lofty, whose characters I consider unblemished, and whose friendship I hold very dear. Most of the time we are in agreement on election laws. I would not take the time to disagree if I did not believe very strongly, very fundamentally, that they are on the wrong track. And I think where they did go wrong was where they got a little confused between early poll closing, dealing with the networks, getting some kind of a pledge which they thought was a great victory, and it was—and I must credit them for extraordinarily successful work in that regard—but them feeling they had to back it up with a bill that forced Federal procedures on States who are unwilling to take them.

Mr. Chairman, my personal poll of the chief election officials of all the States shows that 24 were against it and 23 were for it. Of the 23, more than one-half of them were not affected in their closing hours. Of the 24 who were opposed to the bill, most of them were affected.

I give you the case of Indiana where a change will be from 2 to 3 hours extra time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FRENZEL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Indiana is a State where the polls close at 6 p.m. The people there like that procedure. The election officials like the procedure. The election judges, who are recruited from the public, like the procedure.

Kentucky has a similar problem. There are States that are affected by 1 hour and by 1½ hours. There are States that are not affected at all.

It is, I think, unseemly and unwise, imprudent for this body to force its superior judgment on the States unless there is conclusive, overwhelming, persuasive evidence that some Americans are being beaten out of their vote.

Mr. Chairman, we have not had that evidence. The subcommittee has not had it. I would be delighted if somebody could lay it out for us. There are a number of surveys that suggest that is the case. There are a number of surveys that suggest that is not the case.

If you talk to the participants, most of them lay the blame at the feet of a Presidential candidate who quit early in 1980. I do not know whether they are right or not.

All I know is it is a bad thing for this Congress, for this body, to impose its will in an arbitrary and whimsical manner on a group of States who are doing their very best under very difficult, expensive conditions to maintain their voting laws.

And I might say that most of the Secretaries of State who wrote in opposition suggested that the later closing times on the east coast were going to cause counting errors by tired judges. We went through the Indiana Eight problem. That was a mess. I would like not to have any more counting errors. I would like to have the States run their business in the best way that they know how and in a way that suits them and their citizens.

I, therefore, ask for a vote on my substitute amendment which rejects the bill, strikes everything, and provides for a Presidential commission to report on the matter.

□ 1755

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, let us be very clear. The gentleman from Minnesota wishes to put off the establishment of the uniform poll closing hour and, in effect, have a Presidential study of the issue.

I would just say that this is exactly what the committee has been doing for the last 5 years. The committee has held numerous hearings. The committee has heard from scores of witnesses. The committee has examined very, very thoroughly every single proposal that has been put forward by any reputable source in the elections field. There is absolutely nothing that the President could do that has not already been done in a bipartisan way by the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Washington, examining the whole range of proposals that have been offered over the years. It seems to me that the time for additional studies and repetitive studies has come to an end, and I think it is time to establish a uniform poll-closing law.

I oppose the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I have refrained from examining the particulars of the gentleman's research in terms of his numbers as to how many States favor or oppose it. I will have to say that I disagree fundamentally with his characterization of half for and half against. The research that I have done and that we have done indicate about 2 to 1 for. But the thing that I think is most impressive is the sacrifice willing to be made by a number of States who perceive it to be a problem.

For example, the State of Minnesota has indicated that although their polls close at 8 p.m. central standard time, they would be willing to accept a 9 p.m. closing time, in the interest of uniform poll closing. The State of New Jersey, which now closes at 8 p.m., said they would be willing to take a later time. The State of Nebraska said, certainly, to solve the problem, a later time. North Dakota, yes, to solve a problem, a later time. Tennessee, yes, they would go to 10 o'clock eastern standard time. Rhode Island, which currently closes at 9, said they would be willing to go to 10 o'clock to try to solve the problem.

So it just is not a west coast problem. It is a problem that is perceived as a problem across the Nation.

I would tell the gentleman that if he would examine all of the hearings we have had, they constitute a study, and I personally do not think we ought to give the job of making this decision involved with the election of Federal officers, as outlined in the Constitution, to the executive branch. I think it logically is reposed here. I think the subcommittee and the committee has done its job, and the question is whether or not the House of Representatives is going to join the Presidential contenders and is going to join the networks in solving this problem.

So I would ask for a no vote on this amendment so that we can get on with passing the legislation.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the question is whether the Congress is going to lead or whether the Congress is going to follow. I suppose if we took the suggestion of my colleague from Minnesota about avoiding clerical errors in the elections, we could continue to constrict eligibility of voters, thereby reducing them to almost a minimum and thereby reducing dramatically the number of people who actually vote.

There is an old saying that I saw once in the boiler room of an old Navy ship that went like this: When in trouble, when in doubt, run in circles, scream and shout.

I would add, in light of this amendment: Or in lieu thereof, if a Member of Congress, form a committee and study it to death.

Well, that is exactly what this amendment would do, and make no mistake about it. This is the gutting amendment. If you are in favor of encouraging people to have access to the political process, if you truly believe that the laboratory of American politics is in the living rooms and the streets and the roads and the byways of this country, then vote against this amendment. If you truly believe that economics is a major issue that ought to deter us from changing fundamental policy or ensuring people to have rights and opportunities to access to those changes, then vote against this amendment, as others 130 years ago were urged to do in the name of economics to preserve slavery. Or if you truly believe, as one prominent candidate for office said in 1976, upon suffering an electoral defeat in his own right, "The reason I lost was too many people voted."

Mr. Chairman, we have learned a lesson in the past few days, brought to us most vividly and personally, the visitation of tragedy in each and every single one of this Nation's homes. What the last few days should have underscored for us so dramatically once and for all is the permeation of television as a part of life of America, our very heart and our very soul, bringing emotion, bringing sorrow and bringing death into our homes.

That is the same thing that is going on in these elections, watching that big board behind those wonderful anchors fill up with the tidal wave sweeping from East to West of green, blue, brown, red or white, indicating who has won or lost, thus chilling, much in the same way that lawn signs, much in the same way that people were accosting you before you go into the polls, much as in the olden days, of the solicitation of liquor and money outside the polling place did, to intimidate voters and to prevent them from voting.

We prohibit people standing outside the polls for good reason. We prohibit in many States the serving of alcohol, so that people can make informed intelligent decisions with a clear mind. Is not an equally clear mind reflected in what we do and do not make available to voters sitting in their homes, with the permeation of mass media and television?

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the Frenzel amendment is the ripper amendment. If you honestly believe that public policy, that civic responsibility is going to serve all of us, then let us follow the words of Lyndon Johnson who, when he signed the Voting Rights Act Amendment, just about 20 years ago, said, 'The mandate of November's election must be by the vote of the people, not by the default of the people."

Mr. Chairman, the Frenzel amendment does egregious harm to this bill. It tears it stem from stern and reduces to those who truly want to believe in an open access of all people to all facets of our Government that we really do not care about their problems and, once again, another Presidential study commission is going to be the answer.

I urge the rejection of the Frenzel amendment.

Mr. TAUZIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Those of you who believe that Congress has a reputation of always forming a committee to study a problem to death and who believe that that reputation is valid, let me assure you that we have already formed the committee and we have already studied this problem extensively. Let us not, for heavens sake, repeat it, let us not create another study committee, this time lodged in the executive branch, to study the problem this legislature has already studied in its committees. That ought to be the last thing we should do when we have perceived a serious problem in our Nation's most critical election, the election of our Chief Executive.

Mr. Chairman, there are lots of ways to deny American citizens the right to vote. If you look at American history, you can see that ingenious devices have sometimes been designed. The old poll tax in the South was designed to discourage certain classes of citizens from voting. The registration laws of some States make it more difficult for some citizens to have access to this most sacred privilege in a democracy.

There are many ways that have been designed to prevent citizens from having access to the polls. And then there are some ways not designed intentionally, yet which have the same results. If you watch the results of the way in which polls have closed across the nation and how voters in one part of the country have effectively been denied their real right to cast a ballot in the Presidential election because someone has already told them the election is over, it has already been decided, you would just as soon stay home, and if you knew the numbers of elections that may have been affected in congressional races out West by voters who did in fact stay home because they felt their right to vote had been denied them by someone declaring the election over before they even got in the care and went to the polling place, you would know that what has happened in our society because of this wonderful instrument of television is that some new device unintended but nevertheless a device has been established in our society that equally prevents citizens from voting in this most critical of all elections, the selection of our Chief Executive.

This is what the Congress in the work we have done in studying this Hill and presenting this solution has tried to correct, has tried to correct it with the help of the networks, with the help of the Presidential candidates, with the advice of many in our society through extensive hearings. We do not need another Presidential study. That is simply another way to kill the solution to a serious problem.

I suggest to my good friend perhaps he should have made it a Vice Presidential study. Our President has a lot to do other than to study this issue. We have studied it extensively. It is time now to come up with a solution. We have presented a reasonable one to this body. It is time now to vote on it.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAUZIN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I thank you both for your good advice, and I take this opportunity to advise that I shall not ask for a vote on this amendment. So those who are making plans for the night should be advised there will likely be only a vote on final passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FRENZEL), there were—ayes 13, noes 19.

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there other amendments?

If not, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. TORRES] having assumed the chair, Mr. BARNARD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 3525) to amend title 3, United States Code, to establish uniform regional poll closing times in the continental United States for Presidential general elections, pursuant to House Resolution 329, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FRENZEL) there were—ayes 22, noes 16.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 204, nays 171, not voting 59, as follows:

Mr. JONES of North Carolina (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object at this time so the gentleman from North Carolina can explain this very short and very valuable bill. I do not intend to object, but I want to give the gentleman an opportunity to explain it.

I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, this bill, as passed by the House on June 29, 1985, under suspension of the rules, contained miscellaneous provisions of law affecting Coast Guard operations. The bill returned from the Senate retains nearly all of these provisions in essentially the same form. The Senate has added several minor amendments, but I do not think that any of them are controversial.

Mr. Speaker, this bill was brought up for unanimous consent back on December 19. At that time, my colleague from the State of California, Mr. BADHAM, objected to considering the bill so late in the evening on the closing night of the first session. Subsequently, Mr. BADHAM wrote this letter to me withdrawing his objection to the bill's passage.

Mr. Speaker, I know of no controversies regarding these Senate amendments and believe that both majority and minority leaders of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee are prepared to recommend that the House accept them.

Let me describe the Senate amendments.

New section 9 waives the restrictions in coastwise laws for certain vessels. The House have previously approved most of these in a private bill, H.R. 739.

New section 11 clarifies statutory provisions to facilitate drug enforcement activities of the Coast Guard.

New section 12 provides authority for the Coast Guard to share costs with Cape May, NJ, for improvements of roads.

New section 13 gives the Secretary of Transportation explicit authority to prescribe regulations relating to marine safety and seamen's welfare.

New section 14 amends the towing vessel statutes to close a loophole that allows foreign tugs to be used to tow foreign registry vessels in U.S. ports.

New section 15 resolves an ambiguity in the Shipping Act of 1984 relating to chemical parcel tankers. It clarifies that those vessels are not subject to regulation by the Federal Maritime Commission as common carriers and are, therefore, not exempt from the antitrust laws.

New section 16 establishes a Commercial Fishing Industry Safety Advisory Committee. It is similar to the provisions of H.R. 3025 introduced by Mr. LENT and which I cosponsored.

New section 17 provides authority for three vessels, currently tied up and rusting, to be scrapped in foreign yards if the purchaser and country in which they will be scrapped are acceptable to the Secretary of Transportation and the Secretary is given at least one-half of the profits realized from the scrapping.

Section 18 allows two vessels to be sold to a foreign purchaser if neither the Secretary of Transportation nor the Secretary of the Navy elect to buy them at world market prices.

New section 19 is the same as in section 10 of the House bill with a minor change. It allows the Port of Houston authority to seek up to $450,000 in reimbursement from the Coast Guard for alteration of a bridge.

New section 20 allows the sale of a tugboat free of the requirements resulting from CDS payments.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, the explanation of the gentleman from North Carolina satisfies me.

Mr. Speaker, I too rise in support of H.R. 2466, a bill that makes a variety of changes in laws administered by or affecting the Coast Guard. In particular, this bill includes provisions dealing with:

The operation, sale, or scrapping of various merchant vessels documented by the Coast Guard;

Exemptions for certain permits in the Coast Guard Bridge Program;

Technical, conforming, and miscellaneous changes to the shipping laws in title 46, United States Code, administered by the Coast Guard;

Enhancement of Coast Guard drug law enforcement authority on the high seas;

Establishment of two needed Coast Guard advisory committees to address various matters and problems in offshore oil and gas development and regarding the safety of and insurance for fishing industry vessels—with regard to the purpose of the Commercial Fishing Industry Vessel Advisory Committee, I refer you to the remarks of my colleague, and ranking minority member of our committee, Hon. NORMAN LENT on July 17, 1985, the date he and I introduced H.R. 3025, a bill to create such a committee; and Certain authorizations or restrictions regarding day-to-day Coast Guard administrative and management matters, including letting the Coast Guard freely negotiate a wind generation power agreement on St. Paul Island, AK.

Mr. Speaker, each provision of this bill may not be of great significance in and of itself, but in total they all represent necessary legislation which will benefit the Coast Guard and the maritime industry in the United States.

I recommend that my colleagues fully support this bill.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 2466 for its administrative improvements and in particular for an amendment contained in the bill which I introduced earlier this year to clarify a critical provision of law regarding Coast Guard drug enforcement procedure. In April of this year, I, along with the chairman of the Subcommittee on Crime, introduced H.R. 2132, legislation to clarify the intent of 21 USC 955 as regards the definition of an "arrangement" and return jurisdiction to the United States to intercede foreign drug ships on the high seas.

I wish to commend my friend from New Jersey, the Crime Subcommittee chairman for promptly convening hearings on the bill and providing us the opportunity to learn more about problems facing the Coast Guard in the drug enforcement area. I also wish to commend the Coast Guard staff for providing excellent technical assistance to us on this issue and on this bill.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation was drafted in response to frustrations experienced by our U.S. attorneys in their efforts to convict foreign drug ships. A loophole was created in our jurisdictional statutes by criminal defense lawyers which worked to preclude our prosecutors from obtaining jurisdiction to convict drug smugglers. U.S. law was intended to reach foreign drug runners in international waters and this amendment simply clarifies the intent of the law as it is written. I wish to thank the U.S. attorney's office for their help in defining this problem and I especially thank the U.S. attorneys office in Miami, FL, for providing background information and direction.

Lastly, I thank my friend from Florida, the fine gentleman from the other body, for his efforts in attaching our bill as an amendment to H.R. 2466 and once again helping this country close the gap between the drug smugglers edge and our law enforcement efforts. Our courts have been active in this area, Mr. Speaker, and I am pleased that we have this opportunity through legislation, to clarify this particular issue. This may be only a first step toward clarifying procedure in this area Mr. Speaker, but it is progress in the vast battle against the drug war being waged against my State and this country.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JONES]?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill, H.R. 2466, just considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

SHUTDOWN OF THE TAA PROGRAM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PEASE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, for a few minutes let me take you behind the slick public relations operations in the Reagan administration to show you how ruthlessly some officials wield their influence. I am speaking about the haste and apparent glee with which the Trade Adjustment Assistance [TAA] Program was shut down. Just when we in the Congress and the rest of the Federal Establishment departed town for a festive holiday season last month, the Office of Management and Budget directed Labor Department officials to stop payment of income maintenance payments [TRA] to more than 12,000 unemployed Americans who have lost their jobs to imports in recent years. Quickly following suit, Commerce Department officials right after New Year's sent a mailgram to each of the 13 trade adjustment assistance centers, in effect telling them to close down and stop providing any further technical assistance to small firms struggling to stay in business.

The reason given for these actions is an assertion that the Congress failed to pass the necessary legislation to authorize continued payment of TRA benefits or firm assistance. To the contrary, the fiscal year 1986 Labor-HHS appropriations bill that was enacted in early December, according to the House Appropriations Committee, contains sufficient language to enable TRA benefits to have been continued without interruption as well as the needed flexibility to fund them from the advance accounts. Furthermore, the fiscal year 1986 Commerce-Justice-State appropriations bills specifically appropriated $14.5 million for "grants to maintain the trade adjustment assistance centers." It appears what is lacking is a willingness in the executive branch to continue this program and to adhere to the will of the Congress, not a lack of legal authority or funding for the TAA Program.

Both the House and the Senate passed reauthorization bills as part of their respective budget reconciliation bills. Extension of the TAA Program in all of its facets was one of the first areas of agreement reached by the conferees on the reconciliation bill before the conference broke off, for the time being, in a dispute over the future financing of the Superfund. Also, it is worth noting that Senator PHIL GRAMM offered an amendment to the budget reconciliation bill during Senate debate that specifically sought to abolish the TAA Program. His motion failed miserably and he did not even request a recorded vote because he knew what strong support such a vote would reveal for continuation of the TAA Program.

It is inexcusable in my estimation that with all of the trade problems besetting our country, President Reagan would abolish the only program specifically designed to help thousands of unemployed Americans and their companies that are struggling for survival against foreign competition.

Mr. Speaker, the administration may oppose trade adjustment assistance, they may have abandoned the program, but the Congress has not. The Ways and Means Committee will be meeting next week to try to get through temporary legislation to extend TAA, and we hope to bring to the House floor the reconciliation before the end of February.

I ask my colleagues to join me in supporting this worthwhile program and keeping faith with those Americans who have lost their jobs because of foreign competition.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. NELSON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, January 23, 1986, I was not present for one rollcall vote because the bells could not be heard in the room in the Rayburn Building in which I was meeting with my subcommittee staff. Had I been present, I would have voted "nay" on roll No. 5, the Wylie amendment to H.R. 2443, expedited funds availability.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I was absent on Thursday afternoon, January 23, 1986. Had I been present, I would have voted as follows: Roll No. 7, "no"; roll No. 8, "yes."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SYNAR] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, January 23, I was unavoidably absent due to official business. Had I been present and voting, I would have voted "no" on roll No. 5, "no" on roll No. 6, "no" on roll No. 7, and "aye" on roll No. 8.

SHUTTLE "CHALLENGER"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BONER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BONER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning, our Nation's Space Program suffered a great loss. A tragic accident aboard the shuttle Challenger took the lives of our brave astronauts, including the first teacher selected to be the first civilian in space.

Our hearts and prayers go out to the families, friends, and relatives of the brave men and women who were members of the shuttle crew this morning. We pray for Commander Dick Scobee, Pilot Michael Smith, Astronauts Judith Resnik, Ronald McNair, Ellison Onizuka, and Gregory Jarvis, and civilian teacher Christa McAuliffe.

As a matter of course, an investigation will attempt to discover the causes of this tragic accident. Let us use the findings from the accident investigation to improve the safety of the Shuttle Program. The NASA Space Program has an outstanding safety record. Where tragedy has occurred before, as in the 1967 fire aboard Apollo 1 which killed three astronauts, we have learned from the accident. We can do so now.

Man's exploration of space should and must continue. Certainly the legacy of the shuttle crew who perished yesterday morning should be to continue our reach for the stars. With great sadness over their deaths, we dedicate their memories to this goal.

REPEAL GRAMM-RUDMAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill to repeal the so-called Gramm-Rudman Act, H.R. 4058. Gramm-Rudman makes a fine slogan, but it is the very embodiment of bad legislation, bad policy, and bad faith.

Gramm-Rudman is bad legislation for many reasons. In important parts even the President says it is unconstitutional. It is bad legislation because it establishes a system whereby appropriations acts are undone by acts that are less than laws, acts that themselves are of dubious constitutionality. It is bad legislation because it was drawn without hearings, adopted in a spate of political expedience and cowardice, and perfected in an atmosphere of panic and coercion. It is bad legislation because it attempts to repeal the processes of reason, judgment, and responsibility, and replace them with a rigid, unreasoning, and unyielding economic fantasy, a fantasy that assumes the long discredited fairy tale of voodoo economics is true, after all.

Gramm-Rudman is bad policy, for many reasons. It is bad policy because it creates bizarre effects. It requires activities that are self-supporting and profitable to the Government to be cut, even though the result is actually to increase the deficit the law is supposed to be reducing. It is bad policy because while it protects certain entitlements, it reduces the administrative resources necessary to pay those entitlements. It is bad policy because it treats some retirees generously and denies equitable treatment to other retirees. It is bad policy because it does not distinguish or even permit any distinction in any way between activities that are worthwhile, essential, and even basic to Government function, as opposed to activities that may be of less value, virtue, or soundness. It is bad policy because it replaces judgment with rigid formulations. It is bad policy because it would undermine even such basic functions as law enforcement and tax compliance, because the cuts it requires can be made in no other way. It is bad policy because it undermines and undercuts the whole of the Defense Establishment, without regard to national security or any other consideration. It is bad policy because, as one of its own authors said, "a bad idea."

Gramm-Rudman is a law in bad faith. It is bad faith because some rationalized that it was the way to kill the defense buildup, while others rationalized that it was the way to kill domestic spending; and unfortunately both these sour and wicked notions turned out to be right. It is bad faith because it promises what cannot be delivered, at least on the terms its authors and supporters claimed, a fact that they knew but denied. It is bad faith because it breaks faith with retirees who had right and reason to expect better; it breaks faith with States and cities that will be unable to cope with its rapid and unreasoning abandonment of their needs; it breaks faith with veterans who need medical care, elderly citizens who will find less and less access to medical care, and with all others who had been assured and who require some reasonable degree of help and assistance.

Already, we see the White House changing its budget estimates to hide the impact of Gramm-Rudman. Already, we see that its arithmetic does not work, while the White House steadfastly denies this basic reality. Already, we see that the administration continues, as it has all along, to deny both its own responsibility and to refuse to provide leadership, even to its own partisans. Already, we see the Budget Office redoubling its usual smoke and mirrors effort to disguise the failures of the administration's fiscal program, and rationalize away the real cause—which is voodoo economics.

We in Congress cannot evade our responsibility to establish responsible and workable national policy. Nor can the President. But Gramm-Rudman seeks to do that, by substituting dogma for thought, formula for policy, and providing mass suicide for all who are blind enough to embrace it. This law does not serve the American people; it undermines their most basic interests, their most basic needs, from health to highways, law enforcement to urgent scientific research, from education to air traffic control. This law does not create responsibility, it abdicates responsibility. It ought to be repealed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Ohio, [Ms. KAPTUR] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was unavoidably absent from the Chamber on Thursday, January 23, 1986, on official business and missed several rollcall votes. Had I been present, I would have voted "no" on rollcall No. 6; "no" on rollcall No. 7; and "yes" on rollcall No. 8.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HONORABLE J. EDGAR CHENOWETH

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. STRANG] is recognized for 30 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous material on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Speaker, on January 2, while Congress was in recess, J. Edgar Chenoweth, who was from Colorado and in Congress for 22 years, died.

At this time I yield to my colleague, HANK BROWN, his constituent.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the memory of a former colleague. J. Edgar Chenoweth served in the U.S. House of Representatives for 22 years, longer than any Republican in the history of Colorado. He passed away Thursday, January 2, after a brief illness, at the age of 88.

Judge Chenoweth, as he was fondly known in the old Third Congressional District in Colorado, was first elected to this body in 1940. He was a warm, generous, and able man who served his district exceptionally well. Although he was a Republican in a largely Democratic district, the people of eastern Colorado appreciated his many outstanding qualities, and elected Judge Chenoweth to Congress for 11 terms.

Congressman Chenoweth worked hard and long to advance Colorado's important role in defending our Nation. He helped to locate the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs. And his many efforts in Congress helped locate the Air Defense Command in Colorado.

During his very first term in the early days of the Second World War, he persuaded the Army to establish a post, then known as Camp Carson, in Colorado Springs. And nearly 10 years later he led the move to make the camp a permanent facility, Fort Carson.

Judge Chenoweth was a native of Trinidad, CO, near the southern border of our State. His parents were pioneers, coming from Maryland to settle in southern Colorado. Judge Chenoweth was born near Trinidad in 1897. After graduation from Trinidad High School, he attended the University of Colorado and later studied law in his spare time. He was admitted to the Colorado Bar in 1925 and served as assistant district attorney in Trinidad. He was appointed, then elected, judge for Las Animas County for a total term of 8 years. In 1933 he administered Colorado's first old age pension fund. In both the 1934 and the 1936 elections, Judge Chenoweth was the only Republican elected in the county. In 1937 he was elected chairman of the Republican State Central Committee. After a successful 1940 campaign for Congress, Judge Chenoweth served 22 of the next 24 years here in Washington. In 1948 he lost to Democrat John Marsalis by just 1,800 votes out of more than 128,000. But the Judge was the victor in the next eight elections. He retired to a law practice in Trinidad which he maintained until a few days before his death. He also served as district governor of Rotary. In Congress, he served on the House Rules Committee, and was secretary of the Republican Congressional Committee. And in Colorado, he served on the board of the Colorado Boys Ranch and on the board of the Colorado-Wyoming Railroad. Congressman Chenoweth was a prime mover in making the Trinidad Dam and Reservoir a reality. And he was instrumental in the Frying Pan-Arkansas project which brought water, and prosperity, to the Front Range. Judge Chenoweth married Ruth Olivia Crews on Christmas Eve, 1919. Together they had three sons, William B., of Denver, John E., Jr., of Pueblo, and James R., of Trinidad, and two daughters, Wanda Mattern, of Lancaster, PA, and Ruth Anne Vigil of Mission Viejo, CA. He is survived by his wife and children, and also by 10 grandchildren and 5 great grandchildren. The Judge's papers have been donated to the Western History Library of the University of Colorado. Congressman Chenoweth was a kind man. He is very fondly remembered by those who served with him, and by those he served.

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROWN] for those comments.

Mr. Speaker, Judge Chenoweth, for many of his years in Congress, represented a substantial number of the citizens of what are now in the Third Congressional District which I have the privilege to represent, Pueblo and Pueblo County. My guess is that between Representatives BROWN, KRAMER, and myself we touch on all of the old third that he served so well for many years.

My colleague, Congressman BROWN, has covered his distinguished legislative career and his distinguished career as a Republican in Colorado, but I would like to point out that Judge Chenoweth was a champion of Western water, which is a topic which is particularly important to me and is particularly important to the West. He introduced the Frying Pan, Arkansas bill in 1952, and he introduced it every year thereafter until it was finally passed and signed into law by President Kennedy in 1962.

Construction was begun in 1964, and work on the project was completed in 1984.

The thing that we all remember about Judge Chenoweth, in addition to his championing Western water and his establishment of important military bases in Colorado, his work on the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee; we also remember that he was one of the first members of the then-called Committee on Science and Astronautics. When he joined that committee in 1959, Mr. Speaker, it did some of the very important work in getting our space program underway. It is now the Committee on Science and Technology.

Beyond his temporal accomplishments, the Judge is remembered even more for his warmth and his caring for others. Former Colorado Governor John Love said of him recently.

He brought a special kind of decency and kindness to elective office, and laterally defined the term "constituent service."

To the day when he got sick, Judge Chenoweth never failed to touch personally every person in a room which he entered.

The one common thread throughout all the tributes to him has been citations of his decency, cheerfulness, and desire to help those who needed it. He was truly a representative of the people. He never stopped that service, even after he left the Congress, to return to Trinidad and the practice of law, which he continued to do until a few weeks before he died.

He was married to his lovely Ruth in 1919, Mr. Speaker. They were husband and wife for 66 years. Five children, 10 grandchildren, 5 great-grandchildren survive him, and our prayers are with them in this hour of grief.

I am honored today to offer this tribute to one of the great Colorado Congressmen, who in many ways set the standards in service and devotion to those he represented for all of us who have followed, Judge Chenoweth.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to my distinguished colleague from Colorado, Congressman KRAMER.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join the gentlemen from Colorado in paying tribute to a distinguished Coloradan and an honored former Member of Congress, J. Edgar Chenoweth.

Mr. Chenoweth's passing January 2nd at the age of 88 saddens his colleagues and all those many people, in Colorado and elsewhere, who knew him and respected him. As we mourn the loss of a man known as "the judge," let us take solace as we remember Mr. Chenoweth's long and exemplary careers as a lawyer, a judge, a Republican Party official, and, finally, as a Congressman.

Let us also remember his hard work, his dedication and his achievements. Most of all, let us remember a kind and gracious gentleman whom I was fortunate to call a friend, who devoted so many years to public service and who, always and to everyone, was quick to share a smile and a welcoming hand.

Mr. Chenoweth was a native of Trinidad, CO. He graduated from the University of Colorado and then returned to his home, where he was first a prosecuting attorney and later a county judge in Las Animas County. It was that latter service that earned him his affectionate nickname.

Mr. Chenoweth served in the House from 1941 to 1949 and again from 1951 to 1965. As one who now represents a district once partly included in his, I have had the privilege to see the many fruits of Mr. Chenoweth's labor. In particular, the magnificent Air Force Academy owes its presence near Colorado Springs in large part to Mr. Chenoweth's foresight and diligence. Today, thousands of young men and women from that institution serve their Nation proudly and help keep us strong and secure. Mr. Chenoweth also was mainly responsible for helping establish the Air Defense Command and Fort Carson Army Base, both near Colorado Springs and both vital links in our Nation's defense.

Mr. Chenoweth's efforts were acknowledged by the Army, which in 1984 awarded him its Patriotic Service Award for his role, during his first term in Congress, in persuading the Army to make Camp Carson a permanent base.

Mr. Chenoweth can rightly be called "Mr. Republican" in Colorado. He served as chairman of the State Central Committee from 1937 to 1940 and was a past secretary of the Republican Congressional Committee. His advice and counsel inspired and guided so many other Republicans, officeholders and party members alike. The strength of our Republican Party in Colorado today is due in large part to his patience and effort.

Even after leaving Congress, Mr. Chenoweth continued to play a prominent role in his native community of Trinidad. He resumed his law practice, which he continued right up to the time of his passing. He watched his party and his State grow and prosper, the result of people like him, people who were not content to stand back but who got involved, using skill and hard work to leave this world a better place than before.

Mr. Chenoweth's life and his accomplishments are treasured by all Coloradans. He serves as an example to us all. We extend our prayers and our sympathy to his lovely wife, Ruth, to his three sons and his two daughters, and to the rest of his family. May his memory live on with us and inspire us daily.

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Speaker, I thank Congressman KRAMER. I now yield to my colleague from Colorado, Congressman DAN SCHAEFER.

Mr. SCHAEFER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity this evening to honor such an instrumental figure in Colorado history. J. Edgar Chenoweth, known to most as "The Judge," served the people of Colorado's Third District for 22 years, in which only his dedication matched his accomplishments.

Elected as a Republican in a traditionally Democratic district, Chenoweth's overriding loyalty was to his constituency. Due primarily to his efforts, Colorado has become the home of Fort Carson, the North American Air Defense Command, and the United States Air Force Academy. Even today, few Members have enhanced the economy and image of their districts more than the Judge.

But Chenoweth's achievements in Congress are only the most noticeable in a life dedicated to community service. Nowhere is this more evident than his contribution to the Colorado Boys Ranch. The many hours the Judge spent toward the betterment of the State's young citizens showed that his commitment to Colorado was not restricted to the time spent in these Halls, but was rather his lifelong ambition.

Perhaps his greatest accomplishment, however, was the respect he earned from Members of the opposing party and the press. In fact, the Denver Post once described Chenoweth as "a kindly and gracious man who probably hasn't a single real enemy." As my colleagues well know, this is quite a compliment for a Member of 22 years.

J. Edgar Chenoweth will not be remembered as a Democrat or Republican, but as an individual whose constituents' concerns came before any personal political gain. His career is a model of commitment—one which all of us, from whatever State we represent, should emulate.

Mr. STRANG. I thank the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege to participate in this special order to honor the late J. Edgar Chenoweth.

I would like to thank my colleague, Congressman STRANG, for arranging for this opportunity to remember a special individual and dedicated public servant.

Judge Chenoweth was indeed a special individual. He first became known as "The Judge" during his days as a country judge in Colorado's Las Amimas County during the late 1930's and early 1940's. His friends and constituents continued to affectionately refer to him as Judge Chenoweth throughout his 22-year Congressional career and beyond.

The Denver Post, writing about Judge Chenoweth 20 years ago, said he was "a kindly and gracious man who probably hasn't a single real enemy." The citizens of Pueblo, Colorado Springs and the other communities in the old Third District, I believe, were fortunate to have known Judge Chenoweth.

And he was indeed a dedicated public servant. The Coloradans with whom I have talked remember Judge Chenoweth most for the great care and attention he gave to his district. The Honorable Frank Evans, who succeeded Judge Chenoweth in Congress in 1965, recalls, "He serviced his constituency with his whole heart."

Judge Chenoweth was an ardent and effective advocate for a number of water projects in Colorado, including the Fryingpan-Arkansas project. As a freshman Member of Congress he convinced the U.S. Army to convert then-Camp Carson into the permanent installation, Fort Carson, a role for which he was later to receive the Army's Patriotic Service award. By the time his work was done, Judge Chenoweth was instrumental in also bringing to Colorado the Air Force Academy and Air Defense Command.

Right up to his last days, Judge Chenoweth remained very active and involved. At age 88, he continued to practice law in Trinidad and continued to serve the public that he so loved. His most recent activities included serving on the Judicial Nominating Committee at the request of the Governor.

I would like to express my deepest sympathy to Judge Chenoweth's wife, Ruth Chenoweth, and his five children, 10 grandchildren and five great-grandchildren. All of Colorado shares in their mourning. Yet we also share in their warm memories of a man who generously gave to others—form his heart—both during a long career in public office and in his private life.

Judge Chenoweth was Colorado's own, and he will always be remembered.

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude by saying that the respect and affection, admiration for J. Edgar Chenoweth was so broad in the State of Colorado that rare was the resident of that State who did not know who you mean when you just mentioned "The Judge." Such respect and affection is unusual, well-deserved. We wish the family well.

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY ANTITRUST PROTECTION ACT OF 1986

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, there is an increasing public awareness that America must respond to the competitive challenge from abroad. Perhaps more than ever before in our history, there is a national consensus in favor of more realistic governmental policies which will serve to foster the development of new technology and encourage our own economic growth in face of global competition. Some have responded by urging changes in the Tax Code. Others have sought tougher trade policies and urged import restrictions on certain products. Still others have pressed for expanded regulatory reform and the further deregulation of certain industries.

One area where Congress should focus its legislative attention is on the need to bring about greater harmony between the patent laws and the antitrust laws. For too long, Mr. Speaker, court decisions have reflected an artificial tension between antitrust law, on the one hand, and patent law, on the other. This judicial tension has discouraged both personal and industrial innovation, to the overall detriment of the American economy.

The basic problem stems from certain Supreme Court and lower Federal court decisions that characterize the patent system as inherently in conflict with goals of antitrust law. The Supreme Court, for example, has depicted the patent grant as a "monopoly," the limits of which are to be "narrowly and strictly confined" so as to avoid the "evils of an expansion of the patent monopoly by private engagements". Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Co., 320 U.S. 661, at 665–6 (1944). Unfortunately, the view that an exclusive legal property right; that is, a patent, copyright or trademark, is somehow at odds with a free market system has been reflected in a number of subsequent cases. Deepsouth Packing Co., Inc. v. Laitram Corp., 406 U.S. 518, rehearing denied, 409 U.S. 902 (1972); United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U.S. 131 (1948); International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U.S. 392 (1947); United States v. Studiengesellschaft Kohle, m.b.H., 670 F.2d 1122 (D.C. Cir. 1981).

But the viewpoint reflected in these court decisions mistakes the actual economic relationship between the protection of intellectual property and the goals of antitrust policy. While it might be true in theory that protection of intellectual property can be too generous, it is also the case that inadequate rewards will lead to insufficient research efforts. Reductions in research programs mean fewer new products and processes and, ultimately, less competition. While it is difficult to specify the precise level of protection that is appropriate, it is critical to recognize that any system of intellectual property protection must reflect a carefully structured balance between the dangers of inadequate protection and those of excessive protection. It is an oversimplification at best to regard the patent system or the copyright system as inherently at odds with competitive policy. Rather, intellectual property laws and antitrust law serve complementary functions basic to our national economic progress.

What is needed, then, are revisions in the antitrust laws that reflect a more realistic view as to how intellectual property rights can be exercised without undue fear of litigation. Consequently, today I am introducing the "Intellectual Property Antitrust Protection Act of 1986". Joining me in this effort is my good friend and Judiciary Committee colleague, Hon. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD. Congressman MOORHEAD has long been recognized as a leader in legislative efforts aimed at encouraging and protecting intellectual property rights. Also joining with us as an original cosponsor is the Honorable ED ZSCHAU, who has done such an excellent job as the chairman of the task force on high technology initiatives of the House Republican Research Committee.

Our bill would require that the courts consider the procompetitive benefits of an intellectual property license before they could find that a particular contract or transaction involving intellectual property violates the antitrust laws. Intellectual property licenses would be analyzed and evaluated under the rule of reason test of antitrust law. Furthermore, and importantly, this measure would also remove the possibility of treble damage liability for an individual, a small business, or a corporation which chooses to sell or lease its patent rights or other intellectual property rights to others. The protection proposed in this legislation would cover a broad spectrum of intellectual property, including patents, copyrights, trade secrets, and semiconductor chips.

The presumption that underlies this proposal is that enhanced legal protection of intellectual property rights will, in fact, promote competition. By providing increased safeguards for the licensing of intellectual property, Congress would encourage the private sector in the development and implementation of new technologies. The result will be new and better products, additional market place choices for consumers and lower prices. Recent economic research demonstrates that further protections with respect to intellectual property enhance, rather than hinder, the competition protected by the antitrust laws. Consequently, it is crucial that the antitrust laws not be interpreted in an overly restrictive manner that unreasonably discourages the licensing of technology.

Patent licensing, for example, has the potential for significant procompetitive benefits. Often, the creator of a new product is not in the best position to commercially develop that particular product. Other individuals or businesses may have superior manufacturing capabilities or product distribution networks. Licensing permits the patent owner to match its own knowledge and other advantages with those of its licensees, who may possess superior production, distribution, or marketing facilities or skills. Licensing can result in products getting to the marketplace more quickly or at lower cost than would be possible through reliance only upon the patent holder's own resources. Licensing can therefore be important in allowing patent owners to compete more effectively. Equally important, by allowing the owner to utilize its patent in the way it deems most effective, licensing increases the value of the patent grant, and hence increases the perceived rewards and the incentive to innovate. Facilitating the patent lease transaction can have broad and favorable economic implications.

Investment in research and development is a risky business. An entrepreneur, be he large or small, is unlikely to risk the investment necessary if the prospects for financial reward are not present or severely limited. Again, the license mechanism permits the rightful owner of the technology to combine the idea he owns with the manufacturing or distribution assets of a third party—thereby utilizing the new technology in the most economically efficient manner possible. Licensing often permits products to get to the market place at the lowest possible cost and, consequently, can result in lower retail prices. When licensing leads to a more efficient use of technology and its wider application, consumers will be the ultimate beneficiaries.

The changes we propose in the antitrust laws would further encourage American industry to develop new ideas and new technologies. All too often today, advances in technology are not fully explored because the individual or corporation in question may not have the capacity to market the idea or new discovery. Correspondingly, the current state of antitrust law with regard to patent licensing or the licensing of other intellectual property is simply too restrictive. While some recent court decisions have begun to reflect a better understanding of the fundamental benefits of intellectual property, the business community still needs a stronger, more reliable signal from Congress. Only statutory change can reverse the years of caselaw precedents that have discouraged the full utilization of the intellectual property license in American business practice. We need to encourage such individuals or corporations to believe that they can profitably and successfully license or sublicense their ideas.

In 1984, Congress passed the "National Cooperative Research Act"—Public Law 98-462—which, among other things, prohibited per se treatment of licenses of intellectual property developed through research and development joint ventures. There is no logical reason why we should treat patent licenses which are independently developed any differently than those that are the result of a joint venture. Our bill is based upon concepts originally contained in title III of the National Productivity and Innovation Act which was proposed by the Reagan administration in 1983. Unfortunately, that proposal was never acted upon by the Congress.

Simply put, the time has come to reverse the misdirected judicial hostility seen between intellectual property law and antitrust law. If that legal view was ever valid, it is outdated in our current economic climate. We must remove the threat of treble damage liability from those who seek to more effectively market new technologies. The patent and antitrust laws should be structured so as to be complimentary, not conflicting. This legislation will encourage the creation, development, and commercial application of new products and processes. It can mean technological advances which create new industries, increase productivity and improve America's ability to compete in foreign markets.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM ACT OF 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, few Members of Congress would dispute the fact that our entire system of campaign finance is in dire need to reform. Nothing can mask the fact that the law needs to be changed, and changed dramatically.

I have long advocated a number of reforms designed to improve our campaign finance laws. In recent years, I have introduced bills which eliminate the tax credit for contributions to PAC's, and which prohibit Members of Congress from converting campaign funds to personal use, regardless of when the Member was elected to Congress. But the area of campaign finance most in need of reform pertains to the amounts spent by candidates. The vast sums of money that are being spent running for public office in this country have become unconscionable, and threaten to undermine the electoral process in the United States. Therefore, first and foremost, we need to impose limits on campaign spending. Regrettably, the Supreme Court, in the decision of Buckley versus Valeo, blocked Congress' ability to impose spending limits without making public financing available to the candidates. Only through the inauguration of public financing of House campaigns can we constitutionally curb campaign expenditures.

The cost of all elections in the United States approached the $2 billion mark in 1984. Congressional campaign spending rose from $77 million in 1974 to $374 million in 1984—an increase of more than 385 percent. In the last election, Senator JESSE HELMS set a new all time spending record of almost $16.5 million. His challenger, Gov. Jim Hunt spent over $9.4 million. Senator JAY ROCKEFELLER also reached new heights by spending more than $12 million to win his seat in 1984.

The story is the same in the House of Representatives. The 435 House winners in 1984 spent an average of $288,000 with 10 candidates spending upwards of $1 million or more. If only seriously contested races were included, I believe the winning candidate's expenditures would then average closer to $500,000. Even in upstate New York, many Members have raised and spent almost $500,000 repeatedly, per election cycle. The constant ongoing cycle of raising and spending huge sums, money does not necessarily corrupt the individual, but it surely corrupts the process. Of all the proposed reforms, the most important is to bring campaign expenditures under control.

In the last House election, about 83% of all House winners received a third or more of their contributions from Political Action Committees [PAC's]. There is nothing intrinsically evil abourt PAC's; indeed, they developed as an effort to reform other campaign abuses.

There is at least one troubling aspect, however, to the PAC phenomenon. PAC's have the very real capability to virtually determine the outcome of an election. Under the law, individual PAC's are limited to contributions of $5,000 per candidate, per election. That may not be an amount to be overly concerned with, although I do think it should be lowered. However, if 50 or 100 like-minded PAC's, such as those representing the interests of either business or labor, decide to help a candidate, they have the ability, acting in concert, to pump $500,000 into a campaign in a matter of days. Oftentimes this will occur during the critical last days of a campaign, leaving an unmistakable, and oftentimes surprising, imprint on the outcome of the race. To safeguard against this, many individuals, including myself, have accumulated considerable war chests to cope with the threat of a massive and sudden injection of PAC money into opponents campaign coffers.

Mr. Speaker, I think the point is clear. We must take some form of action, and the sooner the better.

Let's look at some of the reform options that are available. The alternatives include at least the following: first, a constitutional amendment, which would allow spending limitations to be imposed on candidates; second, a new decision by the Supreme Court to reverse Buckley versus Valeo, which greatly restricts our ability to impose spending limits; and third, a system of public financing which would allow us constitutionally to impose spending limitations, and in turn to diminish reliance on PAC contributions.

I have already cosponsored a constitutional amendment. Realistically, however, an amendment has virtually no likelihood of being approved or ratified. With respect to the Court's Buckley decision, at this time, we have no reason to expect the Court to reverse itself and allow Congress to impose strict spending restrictions. The best chance for meaningful reform is for Congress to pass and for the President to approve, a comprehensive reform of the laws which govern campaign contributions and expenditures.

A number of very fine legislative initiatives have been introduced in the House this session which address specific problems in the world of campaign finance. But rather than confine ourselves to a piecemeal approach, we need a comprehensive reform act which imposes overall limits both on overall campaign spending and on PAC contributions to House campaigns, and which provides an alternative source of funding—public financing—for House elections.

The bill which I am introducing, the House of Representatives Campaign Finance Reform Act of 1985, does just this, and more. Specifically, the bill will reduce the amount of contributions a House candidate can receive from individual nonparty PAC's, from $10,000 per election cycle—$5,000 each for the primary and general election—to $6,000 per election cycle. The overall limitation on total nonparty PAC contributions to a House candidate per cycle would be set at $125,000—$100,000 if only one candidate qualifies for the ballot.

In so limiting PAC contributions, we cannot ignore the high cost of campaigning. Indeed, the limitation on PAC contributions could pose a financial hardship to some candidates. Therefore, the second part of my strategy is to install a system of public financing of House campaigns, modeled upon the Presidential Election Campaign Fund which is now in place. Here's how the plan works:

A candidate who complies with certain requirements and is able to raise $10,000 from individual contributions, will receive a matching grant from the Presidential Election Fund, now established at the Treasury Department, for that same amount. Thereafter, the money raised in $10,000 increments will be matched up to a total of $125,000 for the 2-year election cycle. Only 25 percent of the contributions raised under these conditions could come from out-of-state contributors. A cap on the use of personal funds would be set at $50,000, and total campaign expenditures could not exceed $250,000. This scheme would comply, I believe, with the strictures of Buckley versus Valeo.

My bill is also directed at reigning in unwieldy independent expenditures made on behalf of a candidate by unaffiliated organizations. These so-called independent groups, which are paying for such expenditures, would be required to identify themselves at the conclusion of any paid advertisements they might sponsor. In addition, if more than $5,000 in independent expenditures are made in opposition to or in support of a candidate who is receiving public funds, the other candidate may receive payments from the fund equal to that amount.

I firmly believe that now is the time to focus our energies on rectifying the deficiencies inherent in the existing system governing House elections. As we prepare for the 1986 elections, the time is ripe for a comprehensive review of our present system. We must not shirk our responsibility to ensure that the integrity of our electoral process is preserved. Under existing law, that integrity is suspect. Further, the public perception that huge sums of money unduly influence the electoral process is an accurate one, which must be corrected.

My proposal limits both receipts and expenditures, and replaces primary reliance on PAC money with public financing, without undercutting the rights of PAC members to participate in the political process. I urge my colleagues to work with me to achieve this fundamental reform.
